Second, propaganda and operations during the month of the Holy Pilgrimage which Hojat-Ol-Islam Moussavi Khoiniha, who is himself both a contributor to the original plan and an operator as well. If necessary, he can say a few words concerning the operational plan for Haj.

Third, the combat structure of the brigade which must be ready for operation in the waters, airspace and territory of the enemy.

A. At this time, we request the commanders of the various forces (Revolutionary Guards and the three regular forces) to introduce dedicated and religiously committed qualified candidates to the temporary staff of this brigade. These people must have obtained a high school diploma and must have participated in the four year war (with Iraq). They must not be more than 30 years old, preferably bachelors. Their candidature must be approved by the political-ideological offices and these people must be introduced no later than the end of the month of "Tir" (20 July). I underline that these people must in the course of their total commitment to the path of Islam place no value on their life, and must be totally committed to martyrdom.

B. To train these personnel, it is necessary to have the services of officers and non-commissioned officers specialising in partisan warfare (ground forces). His Eminence, our leader, has agreed that should we at present be faced with a shortage of such people, we can invite former officers and NCOs with these qualifications to return to work. In this respect, if necessary, our military attaches in foreign countries can prepare such invitations for military people who are, for whatever reason, living abroad, and they can give them whatever assurances that are necessary. The only point concerning personnel living abroad is that care must be taken that no recommendation be made of people who have acted in a hostile way towards the Islamic regime. Unlike combat personnel, there is no age criterial for these specialised trainers.

C. Specialised officers and NCOs for training people for naval activities—according to the information given by the Navy in the past and at present. were in possession of a strikeforce which might still exist, personnel from this structure are also required by the brigade. If faced with a shortage of such personnel, the above instructions are also applicable in this case.

D. For training in the art of piloting light aircraft, it is essential that we introduce certain candidates to the Airforce. It would be better if the Airforce can create a training centre outside its present bases for it would be more secure. In this regard, more will be said later.

Another thing which is required is combat information, that is airforce intelligence, naval intelligence and ground force intelligence. For this, whatever information which at present is available concerning enemy territory within the various intelligence units of the forces must be made available to the temporary intelligence, and more intelligence officers should be sent to the countries under consideration, under the umbrella of the military attachés office. In this respect, I repeat once again the same proceedures as those applicable to specialized officers and NCOs are to be followed, and in this regard, utilization can be made of former Savak agents and the counter intelligence files of Savak. Here, I have a very important and secret matter to divulge, and that is that so far our organization has been assisted by five Muslim brothers of occupied Palestine who, for many years have served in "the Army of the occupiers of Qods" (Israeli Army), and in the future they will be making all their knowledge available to us.

The target countries are as follows. The first tier is Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, United Arab Emirates and Bahrain. The second tier is Hashamite Jordan. The third tier is as needs be, France and other countries who will try and confront the Islamic Republic.

Our brothers are informed and as stated, know that the reactionary forces of the region with each passing day, either out of fear or for reasons of dependence on the super powers, are arming themselves to the teeth, which is not to the advantage of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and there is no way that we can bring them to their knees unless we are able to inflict relentless blows on them from within. That is, to neutralize them at every step. Here it is necessary that I give a word of caution, that to obtain information from enemy territory you should select and introduce officers who once they have completed their observations and have submitted their reports, do not omit the slightest bit of information which might be of intelligence value.

With regard to Iraq, with the assistance of the 12th Imam, the Sadam (Hussein, President of Iraqi Republic) regime is gasping its final breath, for operations inside Iraq the political organisation which has been through the tireless efforts of the son of Ayatollah Hakim and other brothers is capable of exercising great strength, and in the not too distant future they will enter into operation.

The final request of this organisation is that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs ensure that the fullest cooperation is given to all personnel who are to sent by the organisation abroad (to ensure that they can proceed without delay etc.).

And finally, before I end, I wish to remind you that all specialised and intelligence personnel unlike ordinary personnel must be introduced no later than the 10th day of "Tir" (1 July) so that there is no interlude in our activities.

Concerning the number of personnel to be introduced, outside the meeting certain questions were asked to which I must respond in this fashion, that apart from the command and HQ staff, the ordinary personnel introduced must number between 1500 and 2000, so that proper selection (taking into consideration ideological, combat and other credentials) can be made. There is no objection if the number of candidates exceeds the allocated amount. The other matter is that for forthcoming meetings either for exchange of opinion or for analysing the plan between the various organisations present in this meeting, without resorting to writing, each organisation must introduce a responsible person no later than the 10th day of "Khordad" (31 May)

I have nothing else to say."

Closing remarks by Ayatollah Khatami.

"With repeated thanks to all those present, I request that should any proposals for the further strengthening of this brigade come to anyone's mind, they be submitted in writing by the chosen candidate who will deliver it by hand so that they can be utilised.

Also, since the above proceedings will appear on paper from a cassette disk, I would be grateful if it was accepted that all irrelevant discussions be omitted. If there are no more comments in this regard, we can end the meeting."

The meeting ended at 2400 hours, and this record of the proceedings, after the omission of unnecessary items from the tape was prepared and is certified by all of us.

TWO BILLION FRANCS IN ARMS FOR KHOMEINI

(By Philippe Bernert)

This is the secret tale of six mullahs sent by Teheran with all the treasure from the Iranian war to buy ultrasophisticated materials which was supposed to assure the imam's victory over Iraq and all the other "satans of the world."

More than 20 billion dollars, nearly 200 billion of our francs, constitutes the fabulous budget which the authorities in Teheran have put at the disposal of their arms buyers in order to make ready, under the best possible conditions, the ultimate offensive against Iraq, which has been put off since June and scheduled for September or October. Placed in bank accounts at the Credit Suisse in Zurich, the Union de Banques Suisses in Geneva, and the Midland Bank of London, this gold mine has been put in the care of six mullahs working exclusively for the pasdarans (Guardians of the Revolution), the toughest forces in the regime.

That's what it is, this great development within the Islamic State. Having no more confidence in what remains of the army, navy, and air force inherited from the Shah's time, the ayatollahs are building new armed forces, composed exclusively of fanatic volunteers. Just as Nazi leaders towards the end of World War II, preferred more and more to have the totally committed SS behind Hitler and Himmler, rather than the Wehrmacht.

So in Teheran they have decided to obtain truly modern military equipment for the pasdarans. Although up to the present time the Guardians of the Revolution have only had carbines, now they will be given planes, tanks, and some sophisticated missiles. Since they don't know how to use these things, they are being recruited from among those elements in the traditional army who are closest to the revolution, the instructors and the interim officers. In order to speed up the technical training of these pasdar-ans, training is being carried out as fast as possible.

"This is how I learned to my amazement," tells us a former commander of the Iranian air force, Houshang Mortezai, "that the pupils I had been training on a Cessna, were getting their fighter pilot's license after a hundred hours of flight time, when sometimes a thousand hours are required to become a good fighter pilot."

The objective which the clergy has set itself is to give to the pasdarans, and only to them, the means of winning the war against Iraq. Then, to eliminate the last vestiges of the traditional army and to make this new pasdaran military and religious striking force the spearhead of future battles and conquests. This is probably why the purchasing committees of the Iranian army, under the management of Colonel Azizi, are no longer looked upon with favor in Teheran. They have been short-circuited by some striking personalities who are being talked about in London, Paris, Geneva and Milan:

"They are obtuse, with one obsession: get the very best equipment, the stuff which is usually under embargo. They are incredibly tough businessmen, demanding to inspect the merchandise, refusing to pay until the equipment is delivered in Iran itself. It is true that they have been burned by unscrupulous businessmen who often kept their money for themselves . . ."

At the head of this small group of mullahs purchasing armaments in the West, is a certain Vahed, who is close to the Libyans (he was seen in Tripoli on or about last August 10). A kind of chief comptroller, Vahed is supported by a mullah in charge of the navy, Teymoury, and another, an aviation specialist, Sadeghi. Completing the commando group: one of Khomeini's nephews who is often seen in Paris, another mullah, Sadeh, who often travels in the Scandanavian countries, and a certain person by the name of Ghafemi. Traveling all over the world, carrying new diplomatic passports on each one of their visits, with correspondents throughout the world at their disposal, making blitz appearances, in Argentina, certain African countries, and even the United States, these six members of clergy are spending billions and creating the new pasdaran army.

"They don't buy just anything" one of their correspondents told us in London. "In small select meetings they will announce to you in scathing tones that they are not interested in buying yet another oil tanker for the Gulf. They are interested in political targets. They want to destroy their enemy's economic potential, get to him in his palaces, in the heart of his cities." A terrorist war, that's the pasdaran password. This is why they are increasing their kamikaze units, both in the navy and in the air force.

It is because of this new form of war that the six mullahs are trying to buy very specific kinds of materiel. Just a few months ago they were hoping to get some Exocets from the French government, putting forth the political context as an argument:

"We know that you have been selling equipment to our enemy, Iraq," they said in Paris. "But if you deliver some to us as well, you will reestablish the equilibrium a bit. You will erase some of the unpleasant effects of your decisions and we will be able to consider some detente in our relations."

Paris did not refuse and, for a moment, there was even a question of having a demonstration of the famous AM-39, the air-sea Exocet, for the mullahs. But the situation soured and the mullahs decided to buy Exocet's American rival, the Harpoon. They needed two different models: the sea-sea Harpoon to equip the very few Cherbourg patrol boats which are still in shape to function in the Gulf, and which are desperately short of munitions. And they want the air-sea Harpoon AGM 84-A, which is installed on combat planes or helicopters. But, as it happens, these missiles, which are manufactured by the American company McDonnell Douglas, are under embargo. And Washington expressly forbids selling them to Iranians.

How to get around this difficulty? By getting the Harpoon from another country that can get them from the United States with no difficulty and no limitations. This is why the mullahs have entered into intimate business relations with Argentina. Buenos Aires does the buying. And, using certain front companies set up in Switzerland by the vice-president of an important Western armaments business as a go-between, this highly sensitive equipment is sent off to Teheran.

In order to make efficient use of the new air-sea Harpoons, the Iranians, who now have only an antiquated air force, would need American F5s. Another commodity prohibited by Washington. No problem. Again with the help of billions, the mullahs, they say, have succeeded in obtaining some from Argentina. And perhaps also with Israel as go-between, since Israel can get this type of plane from the United States with a simple telephone call. But the Teheran regime will have no lack of airplanes for its final offensive, as they are supposed to be about to receive, via a Third World country, Soviet MIG 21s.

But even more than on a new air force, the mullahs are betting on equipment intended for suicide sailors and pilots. In Sweden they have ordered 60 small, swift patrol boats. Each one of these, stuffed with a tonne of explosives, could be aimed at either a civilian or a military objective, right in the middle of a port, for example, and cause an explosion with appalling damage. It's just that the mullahs consider the Volvo motors on these units too small, and they are trying to find, on Formosa, 10-11 meter long torpedo patrol boats, which are faster.

But they are really counting on flattening the enemy from the air with single-engine planes which have been turned into flying bombs piloted by kamikazes trained in North Korea. One of these suicide flyers, Houshang Mortezai, whom we met in London, told us the following story:

"Just six weeks ago I still belonged to one of the kamikaze units of the new Iranian terrorist army. I was a commander in the Imperial Air Force, arrested and deported after the revolution but brought back by the mullahs, who needed instructors, and who tested my religious convictions. I was selected along with 32 other pilots to undergo training in Won-San, North Korea during 1982 using single-engine Swiss Pilatus planes. We hedgehopped touching particular tree branches, and flew under bridges, and they had us do the most unbelievable somersaults. That was where, during training, we had our first two deaths. There were others after that . . ."

Successfully ingratiating himself with the mullahs, demoted from his rank as imperial officer, but reintegrated into the new army with the rank of sergeant, Hushang Mortezai had only one idea: to get out.

"I had to wait for just the right moment, which wasn't easy," he told us. "I had to keep an eye on two student pilots, and I was being watched by another guy. Finally we had this mission to the mouth of the Hormuz Straits. Our group had to take four machines to the two important Iranian bases in the region, to Bandar Abbas and Bandar Lengeh. No one had told us beforehand about the change. Taking advantage of a moment's inattention by the head of the patrol, I took a sharp, 90° turn to my right, straight west. It was all so fast, so intuitive on my part, that I didn't even think, I just took off. Twenty-five minutes later, the longest of my life, I landed on the other side of the Gulf, at Sharjah, with all my lights out. The alert had been sent out, but the pursuing Iranians were unable to catch me. Everything that happened was split-second timing . . ."

When the authorities of the small emirate of Sharjah undertook to inspect the plane, they were stunned. They found, well-hidden, 11 cases of dynamite and some highly explosive materials, enough to blow up a port or a city.

"Looking back, I break out into cold sweats," Hushang Mortezai told us. "I knew one day they would put me in command of some boobytrap to go rain death and destruction on Iraq, or somewhere else. That's just exactly what I wanted to avoid, but I didn't know that they had already filled the planes that we were ordered to take to the southwest of the country with dynamite. Why to Hormuz? Doubtless to dive on the American fleet some day."

When he was interrogated by Western authorities, Hushang Mortezai made no attempt to conceal what civilian targets he and his kamikaze comrades were being trained for:

"In order of importance," he explained, "the president's palace in Baghdad, which we could have reached with our eyes closed, since we'd made so many flight simulations for this high-priority target. Then came the Iraqi Parliament, then the armed forces' general headquarters, the Iraqi staff headquarters, the nuclear power plant at Tammuz, the oil-producing centers of the north, the complexes at Bassorah and Fao. My own orders carried the name Kirkouk, the most important oil-producing city in Northern Iraq. I know that there were other targets, outside Iraq, destined for disintegration by our kamikaze planes: all the Arab Gulf States, from Kuwait to Oman, for starters. Although I was able to hide my intention to flee someday, I must tell you that my comrades are one-hundred-percent fanatics. They are preparing to make their strikes and nothing will stop them. All I needed was to look at the reactions of uncontrollable joy after the attacks against the French and the Americans in Beirut last year. . ."

How many of them are there, these men who are willing to risk someday unleasing the deadly fire from the sky? According to Hushang Mortezai there are still 20 of his "first-grade" comrades left. They are to be reinforced shortly by two dozen other volunteer pilots who are now completing their training in North Korea. Will they have the aircraft to complete their mission?

"The unbelievable part about it," a Swiss armaments official told us, "is that we are giving them the means to do this. At first, the mullahs wanted to buy their little flying bombs in France. Single-engines, not in the least designed for terrorism, and built by a little company near Bernay, in the Eure. Since they didn't get what they wanted, the Iranians fell back on the Pilatus PC 7, a single engine meant for agricultural use, for spraying the vineyards and treating the fields with pesticides. These aircraft are versatile, easily maneuverable, fast and economical. Just exactly what the mullahs need for installing explosive charges for terrorist purposes.

"And," continues our Helvetian, sincere and disillusioned, "you probably won't believe this, but we are furnishing them, quasi-officially, here in the land of Dunant and the Red Cross, with the potential to launch the most frightful terroristic operations. The small Pilatus company of Stans, near Lucerne, using as a go-between one of the first-rate front companies which pullulate on Confederation territory, has already supplied Iran with a dozen of these single-engines.

The mullahs have asked for sixty. Another convoy has just left . . ."

Taking a very strange route. A shipment of Pilatus PC 7 components left Stans, heading by truck and by rail toward Milan via the St. Gothard Tunnel. There, a company by the name of Contraves which specializes in anti-aircraft materiel, assembled the aircraft, transforming the peaceable agricultural machines into instruments of combat. The Swiss military pilots delivered the Pilatuses directly to Teheran, making a stop in Turkey. This is because one of the established rules of the very rich and stubborn clerical arms merchants expressly stipulates:

"We only pay for merchandise delivered to the spot."

This whole affair of the Pilatuses delivered up to the terrorist bulimia is creating quite a scandal in Switzerland at the present time. But this little storm is nothing in comparison to the one that would come up if the whole West were to discover just exactly how much the neutral countries are helping the Iranian pasdarans procure the most sophisticated weapons for the most fanatic and pitiless of armies.

As long as they had no real means of fighting against the Iraqis, the pasdarans sent tens of thousands of children to their deaths, children who went off to jump on mines so they could win paradise. These weapons are being sold to them right now, in spite of all embargoes and prohibitions. Confronted with the powerful Iraqi artillery, they needed cannon. They have just received 105a and 155a from South Africa. Why would the land of apartheid come to the aid of an ultra-terrorist country which would try to destroy it later?

"For the money," replies an American arms specialist coldly. "We are under no illusions on that score."

As for the Chinese, they have delivered to Iran, via an intermediary country, 10,000 RPG 7 missile launchers, a Soviet model modified by Peking. The suppliers did not include the sights which are standard equipment on the things. But the Iranians managed somehow to buy the requisite number of sights elsewhere.

"Does anybody realize the enormous size of that order?" comments an American specialist who told us of the fact. "An incredible instrument of death has been supplied to these pasdarans, who from that time on will be more powerful than their own army, externally as well as internally."

The Iranians are trying to find the right response to the enemy's tanks. Their first-rate mullah buyers pulled off a lovely deal getting themselves 1,300 BGM 71 A anti-tank missiles, better known under the designation "Tow," and made in the United States by Hughes Aircraft. Washington had decreed: "Not a single Tow for Iran." After two years of ruses and intrigues the mullahs finally discovered the key. A small shipping company run by a Frenchman who had worked in Algeria for many years in Boumedienne's time, had maintained excellent contacts in the Third World and continues to have dealings with a Panamanian company that has offices in Argentina.

Once again, Argentina is the pivot. By way of Buenos Aires the Panamanian company gathers in a formidable shipment consisting of 1,300 missiles, a 32-tonne load. The Frenchman, lurking in the middle of the web, has already sold the whole consignment to the agent of the pasdaran ministers, by contract No. 3038 at the end of May, 1984, for a total 9,555,000 dollars. For once, because the deal is enormous, unhoped-for, Teheran decided to take some risks and payment was made before delivery through the Melli Bank in London on instructions from the Markasi Bank (National Bank of Iran).

A weapon like this means victory for the taking, the total destruction of the Iraqi armored divisions and the omnipotence of the pasdarans secure. Only one thing is lacking: delivery of the missiles in Iran. And, oddly enough, that is the trickiest part of the whole deal. Transport was supposed to be arranged via Latin America, then via Frankfurt by Lufthansa about the middle of August. Lufthansa being with its sister company, German Cargo, the usual means of traffic between the West and Teheran. The C.P. Company Teheran (actually headquarters for some pasdarans who have been receiving military equipment for the new religious army for months) had even scheduled a definite flight, LH 686, arriving in the Iranian capital at 12:55, for this shipment of "assorted equipment," destined for a private company.

But just as oddly, at the last minute this historic shipment was postponed several weeks. Can the offensive be begun without the Tow missiles, which are the key to victory? From London to Paris to Zurich the mullah buyers have been a furious activity waving their checkbooks around. They are the buyers of US helicopters, which one of their Swiss friends has been trying to get for them, of biological disablers and bacteria, learned terms to start a chemical war, coders and decoders for their own telephones and telexes abroad. They are suspicious; they feel spied upon at every moment.

They have also taken off on a chase after armored vehicles. Still thanks to their supporters in Buenos Aires, they have acquired 200 Tam tanks. Missiles which were actually made in West Germany, then sent in parts and assembled in Argentina. The tanks, the pasdarans want tanks, so as to be independent of the regular army tanks, in order to organize their own army. They have already taken more than 2,000 armored vehicles, Soviet T 62s and T 72s, from the Iraqis, and they would like to turn them against the enemy. But the motors, Polish-made, aren't worth a dime and are constantly breaking down. And the Russian cannons are out of munitions. To change all this, to adapt a Western cannon, to install a new motor, the mullahs are ready to spend millions of dollars. They are talking about it with the Swedish company, Saab Bofors.

The six missi dominici of the pasdarans, rich with the greatest war treasure of all times, tarry indefatigably at all the Western companies willing to supply them with radar systems, amplifiers, coastal defense missiles, Phoenix missiles, etc. While all this is gong on, behind the Iranian tschador, a new kind of army is being formed, whose objectives are essentially political: assassinations, elimination of foreign heads of state, beginning with Saddam Hussein, and the suicide measures: planes stuffed with explosives to crash onto their targets.

"Our 'entehari' (suicide) brigade was somewhat like the embroyo of this force," ex-kamikaze commander Mortezai told us. "In order to accomplish this, we got together 30 Cessna turbojets, a dozen old DC 3s and DC 2s, and 20 Jet-Falcons intended for the naval air force. I left at the time when the Swiss Pilatus had just arrived: their technology was supposed to revolutionize our group.

Following the terrorist era, a terrorist war looms. Twenty billion dollars are being offered to the West to assure the training and armament of the pasdarans' army. Lenin did say that the West would supply the rope with which to hang itself.—Inquiry in London and Zurich, by Fred Saint-James.

12-YEAR-OLD VOLUNTEERS FOR DEATH

Twelve-year-old kids with the blood-red headband of the death volunteers, the Islamic kamikazes. Proudly and solemnly carrying the automatic pistol, almost unconsciously held against their temples, as in Russian roulette, for what voyage to the bottom of hell? Or rather, paradise, as their pasdaran instructors tell them.

These children form the relief troops for the army of a million pasdarans massed on the Iraqi front for the decisive assault planned for the end of September or beginning of next October, the date of the Iraqi invasion.

However, aware of the necessity of economizing on human lives, of using the most modern equipment against the forces of Saddam Hussein, the staff headquarters of the Guardians of the Revolution has recently sent arms buyers to the West. It was a matter of sweeping up planes, cannons, and tanks on all the markets of the world. Special flights, by Lufthansa air freight, are expediting tonnes of armaments to Teheran at this moment.

Forming the regime's new pretorian guard, making up militias charged with the responsibility of keeping watch on factories, ministerial buildings, and schools, the "pasdaran children" feel invested with enormous responsibility. Here they are, all of a sudden turned into adults, powerful, to be feared. They boast among themselves and often salvos go off. They sometimes kill their comrades, wound themselves, even kill themselves. . .—Translated by David Skelly, CRS—Language Services, February 4, 1985.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCONNELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mr. BUMPERS are printed under Statements on Introduced Bills.)

COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP REFORM

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me just swiftly express my thanks very sincerely for the work of the participants and the work performed for the Senate by the majority leader, Mr. DOLE, and by the minority leader, Mr. BYRD, with their work, and the Committee on Committees in resolving a very vexatious thing for us, that is a tough, tough situation for a legislator. It deals with the areas of prerogatives, pride, and pressure, and Senator BYRD and Senator DOLE did a marvelous service to us in resolving that, and I particularly recognize the service of Senator MATTINGLY who has done extraordinary work and Senator QUAYLE, Senator RUDMAN, Senator GORTON, the Committee on Committees, and particularty thanks to the staff members who participated from the minority and majority, Rod DeArment, Richard Moore, and Howard Greene, secretary for the majority, John Tuck, and special thanks to Pat Griffin, who worked so diligently on that and now has gone on to other things here in Washington and to his successor David Pratt. I thank them for their efforts in resolving what is always one of the toughest bones of contention in any legislative body and that is the makeup and the number and membership of committees with which we function and work.

I thank Senator MATTINGLY.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I thank the acting majority leader for those kind words. I also thank Senator DOLE, Senator BYRD, and Mr. Greene, Mr. DeArment, and Mr. Richard Moore, of my staff, for all the outstanding work that they have done on this.

I also wish to say just a special thanks to Senator QUAYLE, from Indiana, because it was the Quayle Commission that set the stage for this reform that we have just undergone. When I look back, it was in the 97th Congress there were 217 slots. In the 98th Congress there were 231 slots. So, what we have now done is reduced, through the cooperation of both sides of the aisle, in reform down to 214 positions. To me this is really a major victory, and it is a major step I think in the reform of the committee system in the Senate.

We all know that it is easy to go up when you want to increase larger numbers, but when you want to come down, we saw that it was a difficult task, but I think, as we look through all the people who served on the Committee on Committees, on the Republican side and certainly on the other side of the aisle, everyone really sort of joined together and everyone wanted reform and we ended up having reform.

So hopefully, I say to my good friend, the Senator from Wyoming, that this same spirit of cooperation will work on the reform of the budget, and I think it will. I think through this cooperative effort we can see that we can make change that is beneficial to everyone.

So I end by saying on the last day before recess I am not only glad to see this come to a conclusion, but I am glad to see it come to a positive conclusion.

Mr. SIMPSON. It certainly has because of the efforts of Senator MATTINGLY. I thank the Senator very much, indeed.

IN SUPPORT OF S. 281, A BILL TO AMEND THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE TO ADD A SECTION DEALING WITH PUBLIC SAFETY VEHICLES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, Senator PRYOR, in sponsoring S. 281, legislation to correct a serious problem in the area of employee use of an automobile. This legislation is designed to ensure that State troopers, sheriffs, sheriffs' deputies, firemen, policemen, emergency medical workers, and other public safety officials are not taxed on any portion of the use of their vehicles.

Last year's Deficit Reduction Act made several changes in the area of fringe benefits. Specifically, the bill that came back from conference added a new section to the Tax Code—section 132—that provided four general fringe benefit categories. At this stage it was impossible to wage a successful battle to remove these provisions. If any employer provided benefit fits into one of these categories, then the employee does not have any income to the extent of the benefit provided. Not included within those categories, however, is the use of a public safety vehicle by a public safety employee, such as State trooper's use of his patrol car.

On December 31, 1984, the Internal Revenue Service issued temporary and proposed regulations dealing with this issue. Under these regulations if certain requirements are met and the vehicle is used only for commuting purposes, the employee had additional income of $4 per day. However, if the conditions for the special $4 per day rule are not met, then the employee will be taxed for the percentage of his or her personal use of the vehicle. This percentage is applied against the annual lease value of the vehicle, depending upon its fair market value. Under these regulations, no exemption has been provided for public safety employees such as sheriffs, State troopers, and firemen. Without an exemption, these officials will have taxable income from the personal use of their vehicles of $4 per day, or alternatively, will be taxed on a portion of the annual lease value of the vehicle and be forced to keep a travel log. In essence, we are imposing a tax on public safety officials for the vehicles they are required to operate in carrying out their responsibilities.

The legislation I am cosponsoring today would add a special exemption to section 132 of the Internal Revenue Code exempting from taxation the use of a public safety vehicle by a public safety employee. The need for this exemption is obvious. State troopers, sheriffs, firemen, and other public safety employees must use their vehicles for the protection of the public. These people are constantly on call and must respond to emergencies at all hours of the day or night whether they are on duty or off. Therefore, they must have the use of their vehicles 24 hours a day. S. 281 would make it clear that we recognize and appreciate the important and difficult role public safety officials play in our society by treating any use of a public safety vehicle as a working condition fringe benefit, and, therefore, not subject to taxation.

Mr. President, to place this burdensome tax on the people charged with protecting and caring for our citizens is an inequity and an outrage. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important legislation which will correct this very serious flaw in the Tax Code.

Thank you, Mr. President.

RETIREMENT OF HENRY EARLE HOLLEY, JR., OF AIKEN, SC

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Palmetto Federal Savings & Loan in Aiken, SC, my good friend, Henry Earle Holley, Jr., recently retired from his post after an illustrious 34-year affiliation with this growing financial institution. This is an organization with which I am very familiar, as I had the privilege of cofounding Palmetto Federal in 1951, and serving as its first president until 1954, when I was elected to the U.S. Senate.

Since its early days, Palmetto Federal has greatly benefited from Earle Holley's leadership. He was a charter director in 1951, became president in 1964, and chairman of the board in 1982.

Earle Holley comes from a fine family with a rich heritage in the Palmetto State, and all who know Earle would agree that he is a true southern gentleman. Indeed, his exemplary character is a result of his commitment and service to God, country, and fellow man. Earle Holley served our Nation during World War II as a decorated Army infantryman in Europe. His contributions to our State earned him the prestigious Governor's Order of the Palmetto in 1971—South Carolina's highest award. A civic-minded individual, Earle Holley has devoted much of his time and resources to make the Aiken community a better place to live and work. He is an involved member of the First Presbyterian Church, and his life epitomizes those Christian virtues which all men should strive to attain.

Mr. President, I want to offer Earle and his lovely wife, Laura, my best wishes for many years of good health and happiness as he begins his much-deserved retirement. In order to share more about Earle Holley's life, I ask unanimous consent that articles from the Augusta Chronicle and the Aiken Standard be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIKEN BANK OFFICIAL RECALLS LONG CAREER AS RETIREMENT STARTS

AIKEN—Henry Earle Holley Jr. is not the kind of man who likes to talk much about himself. In the tradition of the Southern gentleman, he prefers to let his acts speak for him.

The former chief executive officer and chairman of the board of Palmetto Federal Savings and Loan retired Wednesday after guiding the 34-year-old institution through its founding years into prosperity.

He is: A decorated World War II veteran who served in Europe with the U.S. Army; past owner of Holley Motor Co. in Aiken; a developer of Kalmia Plaza Shopping Center; charter director of Palmetto Federal in 1951 (then called Aiken Federal Savings and Loan); 1971 Governor's Order of the Palmetto recipient; and a leader of First Presbyterian Church in Aiken.

"Just like anything else, you should improve your environment," he said recently. "You have an obligation to try and leave a better place for your children and grandchildren."

Duty, honor and integrity are the qualities Holley credits for his successes—a moral code borrowed from glorious times past, and which Holley said still holds merit today.

"Your word is your bond," he said. "You don't have to sign your name to it. I've done a lot of business deals with the shake of a hand. Integrity—that's one thing people can't take away from you."

Holley, who turns 62 in March, will keep a hand in the company as a consultant and chairman of Palmetto Service Corporation, a real estate subsidiary of the savings and loan.

But he's looking forward to his retirement, to days of fishing and golfing and farming on a 740-acre tract of land outside the city of Aiken that has been in the Holley family for nearly a century.

Holley's family tree branches back to ancestors here before Aiken County was founded in 1872, including a great-grandfather who was the country's first sheriff.

But it was his grandfather, B.F. Holley, who ensured that his sons and grandsons would be among the leaders of Aiken County in the 20th century.

A large landowner and enterprising businessman, B.F. Holley acquired some 4,000 acres of land around Aiken in the early 1900s. By 1922, the year before Henry Earle Jr. was born, he owned the Ford dealership in town and was selling Model Ts, Holley recalled.

Holley grew up during Aiken's heyday as a winter resort for wealthy Northerners, working part time at Holley Motor Co., and entered Clemson University in 1940.

In 1943, he joined the Army Infantry Corps, served three years in Europe and returned to Aiken in 1946 to work with his father at the car dealership.

He married the former Laura Clowe in June 1947, and two months later, at the age of 24, found himself president of Holley Motors following his father's fatal heart attack.

It was not until 1951 that he was elected one of the founding directors of Aiken Federal, organized by the law firm of Thurmont Lybrand and Simons with former South Carolina Governor Strom Thurmond as its first president.

The company started small, Holley recalled, offering savings accounts and home loans principally in Aiken. Thurmond left the institution in 1954 following his successful write-in campaign for the U.S. Senate, turning the leadership over to E. E. Child.

"As we grew, it took more and more of my time," Holley said. "I was taking all day Tuesday away from my dealership to do appraisals."

He was approached a number of times to work full time for the savings and loan, but it was not until 1960 that he sold the car dealership and joined the management force at Aiken Federal.

Eight years later, the company took a growth posture and installed mobile banking services to five outlying communities, Williston, Barnwell, Edgefield Johnston and McCormick. All but Williston now have full-service offices.

The mobile unit was one of the first to use an on-line computer terminal and it fostered the growth of the company from $33 million in assets to $325 million today.

Along the way, the company's name changed twice, finally adopting its present name in 1969, Holley said.

He attributes the success of Palmetto Federal to aggressive branching policies, a responsible and dedicated board of directors, installation of television drive-in service and advertising.

"Also, the policy has always been that we made loans to all folks. We give good honest service. Aiken, too, has grown and SRP and all that certainly contributed to all that (growth)," Holley added.

"CHAIRMAN, CHIEF EXECUTIVE OF PALMETTO FEDERAL RETIRES"

AIKEN—H. Earle Holley Jr., chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Palmetto Federal Savings and Loan of South Carolina, resigned his post Wednesday at the institution's annual meeting.

He will be replaced by John W. Cunningham, who has served as vice chairman of the borad since 1983.

Holley, 61, will remain a member of the board and will serve as chairman of Palmetto Service Corporation, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the savings and loan dealing with various real estate ventures.

Holley joined the association as one of its original directors in 1951 when Strom Thurmond, now a U.S. senator, directed the institution as president. Holley split his time between the association and his Ford dealership.

He later became vice president of the firm, then known as Aiken Federal, and was named president in 1964.

"We were successful because of a philosophy of delivering a superior quality of service," Holley said Wednesday.

Cunningham, who has been a member of the Palmetto board since 1980, took on the duties of chief financial officer in 1984.

He served as vice president for finance and treasurer of the Graniteville Co. from 1972 to 1984. Previously, Cunningham held several senior management positions with the Reliance Electric Co. and U.S. Gypsum.

In other business at Wednesday's annual meeting, the board appointed retired Lt. Gen. George Forsythe of Beaufort to a director's post. Forsythe has served as chairman of Palmetto Federal's regional Board of Directors in Beaufort.

Re-elected to three-year terms were J. Frank Cummings Jr. of Hampton, Charles E. Simons III of Aiken and Holley.

Palmetto Federal operates 15 banking centers across the southern part of South Carolina.

HOLLEY ANNOUNCES RETIREMENT; CUNNINGHAM IS BOARD LEADER

H. Earle Holley, board chairman and chief executive officer of Palmetto Federal Savings and Loan in Aiken, announced his retirement yesterday.

John W. Cunningham will assume Holley's position. A former Graniteville Company executive, Cunningham has served as vice chairman of the board of directors since 1983.

Holley will remain a member of the board and will serve as chairman of Palmetto Service Corp., a wholly owned subsidiary of the savings and loan. He will continue to be closely involved with the firm's varied real estate ventures and developments, according to a press release from the institution.

Holley had indicated to Palmetto's board in 1983 that he intended to retire. The expected move was announced at Palmetto's recent annual meeting held in Aiken.

Also at the annual meeting, retired Lt. Gen. George Forsythe of Beaufort was named as a director of the association's corporate board. He will serve a three-year term. Forsythe has served as chairman of Palmetto Federal's regional board of directors in Beaufort.

Holley joined the association as one of its original directors in 1951 at the age of 28. He divided his time between the family Ford dealership and his responsibilities under the association's former president Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., the release said.

Holley later became vice president of the firm, then known as Aiken Federal. The association was later named Aiken First Federal. He was named president in 1985, succeeding E.E. Childs.

Looking back at the institution's 34 years of growth, Holley commented, "We were successful because of a philosophy of delivering a superior quality of service. My predecessor E.E. Childs insisted on it."

Cunningham served as vice president of finance and treasurer of the Graniteville Company from the time he and his family moved to Aiken in 1972 until 1984. Prior to that, he served in several senior level management positions with the Reliance Electric Company.

Cunningham holds a B.S. degree in commerce from the State University of Iowa. He completed graduate work at Harvard, Northwestern and Notre Dame.

JOBS TRAINING PARTNERSHIP PROGRAM AND "NETWORK" IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in 1982, Congress wisely passed the "Jobs Training Partnership Act" [JTPA] which I supported, as a viable alternative to the "Comprehensive Employment and Training Act" [CETA]. The purpose of JTPA is to encourage greater involvement of private business and industry through a cooperative Federal jobs training program.

Ideally, the role of Government in providing unemployment compensation to jobless persons who are able to work should be a very limited, temporary one. Unfortunately, those persons who are displaced from jobs, and those who experience difficulty in finding employment initially, often do not possess the skills necessary to perform available jobs in our rapidly changing, high technology society. The JTPA is designed to give people the educational opportunity to develop their skills so that they can qualify for available employment and thereby earn a respectable living. Because its mission matches up well with the need in our society, this program has quickly become popular and cost effective.

I am pleased to announce that the JTPA program has been a tremendous success in South Carolina during its first year of implementation. Over 6,000 South Carolina citizens have received jobs as a result of JTPA training, resulting in millions of dollars' worth of reinvestment in our State's economy.

The private sector in the "Palmetto State" has responded to this program with great interest and enthusiasm. Special recognition and commendation go to the South Carolina Private Industry Council for its efforts in promoting "Network," the program which encourages business and industry to participate in this valuable job training project.

Mr. President, I am encouraged by the progress which has already taken place in this exciting endeavor, and I am confident that there will be even greater progress made in the future.

In order to share more about the success of JTPA in South Carolina and the contributions of "Network," I ask unanimous consent that a report to the South Carolina congressional delegation, by Mr. Louis Jordan, and related material, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JTPA—FIRST YEAR IN SOUTH CAROLINA

(By Louis Jordan)

Members of the South Carolina Congressional Delegation. Ladies and gentlemen. Thank you for the opportunity today to appear before you.

My name is Louis Jordan. I come before you to share some good news about important Federal legislation which you have supported and which has helped thousands of South Carolinians to find meaningful employment over the past 12 months. I am speaking of the Job Training Partnership Act.

The Private Industry Council here in South Carolina manages JTPA programs throughout the State. The PIC, as we call the council, is comprised of private business men and women like myself. As a member of the South Carolina PIC appointed by Governor Riley, and as chairman of the Dislocated Worker Committee, I want to tell you about the results of our first year with JTPA and recommend that this program be continued.

When Congress passed the Job Training Partnership Act in 1982 to replace the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, or CETA, it meant an increased role for business and industry in the design and management of federally sponsored, private sector job training activities. As a result of this partnership, between September 1983 and September 1984, we served a total of 13,570 individuals, 8,586 of whom received training and 6,262 of whom now have skilled jobs. Over 6,000 of these individuals were employed at an average wage of $4.26 per hour.

In 1984, this Federal job training program had impressive economic impact on our statewide economy. The data gathered by the Governor's Office, division of employment and training, indicates that the Federal dollars South Carolina received through JTPA went directly into training and placing many unskilled people who were on the welfare rolls and considered hard to employ. At an average of $4.26 an hour, 6,262 recently hired workers are each earning an average of $8,860 per year, before taxes. That means an addition of between $150 to $200 million for the State's economy. With ongoing plant closings across the State, JTPA programs have been essential to offset the more than 6,500 jobs lost through textile and other industrial layoffs last year alone.

How does South Carolina compare to the rest of the Nation in terms of efficiency? As the next graph shows, we had a 78-percent adult employment rate from September 1983 to June 1984. By comparison, the national average in the program's first year was 68 percent or 10 percent lower than South Carolina's adult training and placement rating. In addition, the cost per adult employed was $3,757, compared to a $4,372 national average. Almost 75 percent of adults hired in this State after receiving JTPA-funded training are no longer living on State or Federal subsidies. That's 17 percent higher than the national average of 58 percent.

The year 1984 was a good year for JTPA in South Carolina but we still have a significant task ahead in the area of employment and training. Thirty-one thousand jobs have been lost in the textile industry alone; however, 15,000 new jobs have been created with more than $2 billion in capital investments last year. We face a major challenge in employing and training the people in South Carolina so that the State can continue to move forward.

Governor Riley has asked Bob Royall, chairman of our Private Industry Council, to head up a special task force to address this challenge on several fronts including the maximum utilization of $400 million in State job training funds. While we attempt to intensify our own efforts here in South Carolina, let me say to our congressional representatives that we cannot meet this challenge without your commitment. We are relying on your continued support of job training and economic development programs like JTPA which are proof that the public and private sectors can work as partners for the good of the people who need these programs most of all.

Thank you for your time and your commitment.

"NETWORK"

A PROJECT OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA PRIVATE INDUSTRY COUNCIL

The Approach

The Job Training Partnership Network was designed in cooperation with business throughout the state. The primary goal of the program is to harness the skills, knowledge and expertise of the private sector in determining where the jobs are and in fitting the worker to the job.

One of the unique aspects of the Network is that it is designed to support and assist private business.

Potential employees are screened according to your requirements. You hire and retain only those persons you choose. Program involvement lasts only for the duration of training, but the benefits continue.

The program is flexible to your needs. You define the requirements, training and degree of involvement you want.

Your business and your records are your own. The Network Partnership only extends to locating, training and providing you with the workers you determine you need.

Network was designed by business for business. The benefits are for you.

On The Job Training

On-the-job training is available statewide. If you desire, a Network representative will come to your place of business.

Together you determine the specific job openings you have or anticipate, and the basic level of skills you feel are necessary for any potential employee to begin training in those positions.

The Network representative locates and screens possible candidates against the skills requirements you set forth. You are assured, then, of seeing only those persons with the skills you need. You select only those persons whom you want.

Once you have identified the persons capable of fulfilling your requirements, you hire and train the employees. During the training period, up to 50 percent of the employees' wages may be provided by Network. You need only supply an accounting of the time each employee works and at what rate. Your Network representative will complete the necessary forms and arrange for payments.

Classroom Training

Again, you and your Network representative determine your employment needs and the skills requirements of the available positions. If the job skills involved require more specialized training, one of two things may happen. You may select from trainees already enrolled in Network classroom training and fill the positions in a timely manner.

If, however, there are no trained applicants available at the time of your request, appropriate courses within the South Carolina technical training system will then be identified and your chosen candidate enrolled and trained at no cost to you.

Tax Credits

The benefits for participation in the Job Training Partnership Network are not limited to training. You can receive a tax credit of up to $4,500 per qualified employee hired.

Many potential workers supplied for you by Network will qualify you for these employer tax credits. Potential employees with the necessary requirements will be furnished with a preliminary voucher stating such.

Then, at tax time, you file only one two-sided form (IRS form #5884-Jobs Credit) for all your eligible Network employees. Not one form each—one form for all. As you already have a file of eligibility certificates and your payroll provides an employment record, no extra corporate paperwork is required.

Claiming the jobs tax credit is only a tax filing detail and does not expose you to any additional government regulation.

Customized Training

In the event that no training is currently available for the skills your jobs require, customized training can be arranged.

Your Network representative will identify applicants with the entry level skills you deem necessary to be trained in the specialized job. Once you have selected the acceptable applicants, customized training will be designed that best meets your needs.

Customized training can be provided in your workplace and be conducted by your own employees. Your employees will then be paid as training instructors by the Job Training Partnership Network.

If it is not practical to conduct the training in your location, Network will endeavor to locate an alternate training site where customized training can take place.

In this way, and many others, you and other members of the private sector form the partnership working together to locate, train and employ skilled workers while availing yourself of the most rewarding and cost effective means to do so.

Becoming a Partner

Add it up. You set the guidelines. Hire only the people you want. Save recruitment and screening cost. Save administration cost. You get up to a 50% salary reimbursement for on-the-job training. Classroom training at no cost. Customized training. And a tax credit for many employees hired.

Best of all, you get skilled workers.

So when it comes down to the bottom line, the ultimate net is work.

Joint the Partnership.

The savings are yours, the gains are yours, and the Net is Work.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF DONALD PAUL HODEL TO BE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I support the nomination of Donald Paul Hodel to be Secretary of Interior.

Prior to 1981, there was trouble in America's last frontier:

We had just emerged from a decade-long battle over the future of Alaska's lands.

The Federal Government had refused to convey the lands promised Alaskans at the time of statehood.

The Federal Government, in the minds of many Alaskans, was a greedy, hard-hearted absentee landlord in control of almost 80 percent of our State.

Washington simply didn't seem to understand Alaska's problems, and it didn't want to understand them.

I do not exaggerate when I tell you that a "Tundra Rebellion" was eminent.

All this changed when President Reagan came to the White House. Almost overnight, Alaskans were hearing about the Department of the Interior's good neighbor policy.

The Federal Government began to convey lands that had been promised 20 years before. Genuine concern over the future of my State suddenly became a factor to be considered at the Department of the Interior.

Alaskans really began to feel that their absentee landlord had moved closer to them.

Don Hodel was a part of that change of attitude at the Department of the Interior. After speaking to him in my office 2 weeks ago and participating in his confirmation hearings before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee last week, I am confident that the improved relationship begun under Secretary Watt and continued under Judge Clark will also continue under his leadership.

Secretary Hodel will have one of the most difficult jobs in the Cabinet.

He must balance the interests of backpackers and strip miners.

He must manage wilderness as well as mineral leases.

With respect to OCS leasing in Alaska, he must consider the interests of commercial and subsistence fishermen in Alaska who derive their living from the sea; but he must also recognize the fact that 60 percent of the Nation's undiscovered oil and gas reserves may lie off Alaska's coast.

I don't envy Secretary Hodel because the diversity of thinking among the entire spectrum of interest groups out there is assurance that he will never be a stranger to controversy.

But I have great respect for him, his intellect, his fairness, and his willingness to take on this tremendous job.

Thank you Mr. President, I yield the floor.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF JOHN HERRINGTON TO BE SECRETARY OF ENERGY

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I support the nomination of John Herrington as Secretary of Energy.

I had the opportunity to consult with Mr. Herrington in my office last week, and I participated in his confirmation hearings before the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. I am convinced that Mr. Herrington will make an excellent Secretary of Energy.

Energy remains a very misunderstood issue. The public has all but forgotten the days when we were held in the grasp of OPEC. Now that the gasoline lines have disappeared and energy prices have declined, the public's attention has turned away from the need for sound energy policy.

But energy policy is still important today. There are some disturbing trends which lead me to believe that we could still find ourselves in a serious energy supply disruption once again.

During the 1970's, our proven reserves of oil fell by a third. We are still importing roughly a third of our oil, and our trade imbalance continues to grow out of control, partially as a result of the costs of imported oil.

We are importing more and more refined product. We need to remember that a dependence on imported product is as bad, if not worse, than a dependence on imported crude.

This is the situation which faces Mr. Herrington, and we must not allow complacency to make us vulnerable to the actions of OPEC.

We must not lose sight of a basic goal that must lay at the foundation of our energy policy; namely, to achieve the highest degree of energy independence that we can.

I hear a great deal of talk about energy independence in this Chamber. But I am deeply concerned that we are pursuing a number of policies that are taking us further and further away from that goal.

We still have OCS leasing moritoria in effect today. That makes absolutely no sense when you consider that most of the Nation's new oil and gas reserves will come from the Nation's Outer Continental Shelf.

We still prohibit the export of Alaskan North Slope crude, in spite of the fact that the lifting of the export ban could encourage production from new fields in Alaska, enhance our energy security, lower our staggering trade imbalance, and result in millions of dollars worth of transportation savings and increased tax revenues.

Again, we make brilliant speeches about energy independence, but our policies don't always reflect our rhetoric.

I know that Mr. Herrington is aware of these factors, and I will support his nomination wholeheartedly.

G. RAY ARNETT ELECTED NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on January 26, 1985, the National Rifle Association of America lost to retirement one of its most dedicated and successful chief officers, Harlon B. Carter, the executive vice president of the 3 million member organization. His has been a lifetime of great dedication, good will, high standards, and unwavering defense of the U.S. Constitution, especially the second amendment right to keep and bear arms. Mr. Carter will continue to serve the NRA in an advisory capacity and will serve on the association's executive counsel. I know this body will want to join me in extending our best wishes to Harlon Carter as he begins his retirement.

At the same time, it is with great pride that I announce to my colleagues that G. Ray Arnett, former Assistant U.S. Interior Secretary, was unanimously elected to the post of executive vice president of the National Rifle Association by the NRA Board of Directors on January 26.

A Marine Corps veteran, Arnett saw combat during World War II in the Pacific theater, during which he received a field commission. During the Korean conflict he served an additional 2 years.

Ray Arnett is an avid sportsman and outdoorsman who has devoted much of his life to the conservation, preservation, and enhancement of wildlife. Later he was appointed by Gov. Ronaldan, of the Wildlife Legislative Fund of America and its companion organization the Wildlife Conservation Fund of America. A former NRA board member, Arnett also has held posts with the Wilderness Leadership School, Game Conservation International, World Wilderness Congress, Californians for Recreation and Ducks Unlimited.

An internationally acclaimed hunting and conservation expert, Arnett recently resigned from his position as Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Fish, Wildlife and Parks. He was appointed to that position by President Reagan early in 1981.

This brief recitation of Ray Arnett's credentials are only the tip of the iceberg. Ray is a giant of a man, not only in stature, but also—and most importantly, in his deep commitment to protect and defend the U.S. Constitution, especially the second amendment. He has played an integral role in promoting hunter safety and wildlife management. He has served his community, local, State, and Federal Government well in the past. The National Rifle Association will most assuredly benefit with Ray Arnett at the helm.

Mr. President, I would like to call on my colleagues to join me in extending our congratulations to G. Ray Arnett as he begins his duties as executive vice president of the National Rifle Association.

THE CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BUSING CASE: STILL FESTERING

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools case, decided by the Supreme Court in 1971, was the landmark decision on forced busing by race. It began a revolution in American public education, disrupting the schools and creating havoc for a generation of schoolchildren. I do not believe it is possible to account for the much publicized decline in achievment test scores nationwide without careful examination of the adverse effects of forced busing.

The busing controversy presents a classic case of professional elites—judicial, journalistic, and educational—promoting radical change, having little or no personal effect on them, while citizens most adversely affected by such change largely opposed it. In this case the change was the abolition of the neighborhood school for the sake of achieving racial quotas. The power here has been in the hands of the elites, and the American people and their children—especially blacks—have suffered accordingly.

Mr. President, relatively little has been written about the problems attendant to busing in Charlotte and elsewhere, largely because those in a position to write and publish—the elites—have themselves been the architects of this round of social engineering. Rather than taking a critical look at forced busing, these elites, while often sending their own children to private schools, have been leading the chorus in favor of busing in the public schools. As a result, busing has become a pedagogical sacred cow, and anyone with the temerity to question it can expect to incur the wrath of its ideological defenders.

Recently, Ralph McMillan, a Charlotte lawyer and former city councilman, wrote a thoughtful and informative column in the Wall Street Journal about the Charlotte-Mecklenburg busing experience. His candid conclusion is that, despite the good faith effort of the local community to make the best of a bad situation, busing has improved neither the general quality of education nor the education received by blacks. In fact, Mr. McMillan points to evidence that it has hurt both.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. McMillan's article in the Wall Street Journal of January 21, 1985, entitled "That Success Story," be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THAT BUSING SUCCESS STORY

(By Ralph McMillan)

Charlotte, N.C., was one of the first cities in the country to undergo forced busing. Today, it is often held up as a shining example of how busing can succeed in accomplishing desegregation without lowering the quality of education.

But now, the school-busing issue that so divided my native city and others in the early 1970s is back in the news as the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals prepares to rule soon on the case of Riddick vs. School Board of Norfolk, Va. In an attempt to establish a voluntary system of integration favored by both blacks and whites, Norfolk is working to avoid many of the pitfalls inherent in a mandatory system such as Charlotte's.

The issue involved is almost certain to reach the Supreme Court: Can a school system under a court-ordered busing plan decide on its own to cut back on busing now that it has satisfied the courts that it has desegregated? A group of Norfolk residents has filed suit to prevent the partial dismantling of the forced school-busing plan in effect there. Instead, the school board proposes that elementary schools only adopt a modified "neighborhood" school system to try to end the flight of white children from Norfolk's schools.

SOME SIGNIFICANT LESSONS

Charlotte's history in this issue offers some significant lessons.

When President Reagan visited Charlotte during his reelection campaign, he called court-ordered busing a "social experiment that nobody wants" and one which had "failed."

The response by the local establishment was swift. The Charlotte Observer, the area's largest paper, fired an editorial salvo, later reprinted in the Washington Post, entitled "You Were Wrong, Mr. President." It stated that Charlotte's "proudest achievement is its fully integrated public school system . . . born out of a bitter controversy" and declared that Charlotte's school system "has blossomed into one of the nation's finest." Supporters of forced busing to achieve racial balance have for years proudly cited Charlotte as an example of where busing worked. But how necessary was busing in Charlotte and what is the bottom line when its costs and benefits are balanced against each other?

I believe that the relative success of the busing experiment in Charlotte stems from the positive racial attitudes held by citizens of Charlotte rather than from the practice of forced busing itself. Many residents here have always been uncomfortable with segregation. In the early 1960s, most civic leaders pushed for voluntary, gradual integration when confronted with the problem of how to end the system of segregated schools. Before the decision requiring forced busing. Charlotte was slowly but surely integrating.

Around 1965 the community eradicated the practice of assigning black students to all-black schools, called "union schools." It was replaced by a system making pupil assignment dependent on geographical location supplemented by a freedom-of-choice option. Under this scheme all students could transfer to any school they wanted if they could furnish their own transportation and space in the school was available.

By 1969, there were only eight schools out of 106 in the system that were not integrated in some manner. Out of a total of more than 20,000 black students, the number attending integrated schools had increased from a few dozen in 1964 to nearly 10,000 in 1969. This system satisfied the then federal district court judge for Charlotte, Braxton Craven, when legal action was first filed against the school board. Because of the steps already taken, no federal remedies were prescribed.

However, this didn't satisfy Julius Chambers, a local civil-rights attorney, who had pressed for further judicial relief in 1968. The rest is history. James McMillan, the new federal court judge, required forced busing to achieve racial balance in Charlotte-Mecklenburg schools in the fall of 1970. The Supreme Court unanimously upheld his decision.

Opposition mounted to the order. Most community leaders did not support forced busing. Many whites fought it because they felt educational standards would decline with the chaos forced busing would cause. Many blacks also opposed it because they realized a greater percentage of blacks than whites had to be bused to meet the required racial quotas. Violence and riots erupted, causing academic test scores to sag. Even the Charlotte Observer reported, "The anti-busing furor create(d) a highly charged atmosphere. . . . Racial tension within the schools became a fact of life in Charlotte." This grim condition continued until at least 1975.

After the initial struggle to overthrow court-ordered busing, a sense of futility set in. Once people knew that busing was here to stay, they accepted the verdict reluctantly and resigned to adapting to a difficult situation. In 1973, a coalition of black parents and white parents formed the Citizens Advisory Group to insure that the desegregation plans mandated by the federal courts would be applied equitably. The school board initiated various educational programs to improve the quality of education for all students.

Jane Scott, a former member of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg School Board and an opponent of forced busing, says: "Once the Supreme Court ruled that we had to implement 'busing,' I and many others did all we could to assure that the school assignments would be as equitable as possible. . . . The children had come first." Because of leaders like these, Charlotte managed to cope with the situation.

Despite the efforts of residents to make their school system work, evidence exists that many whites abandoned the public schools and that white flight is continuing. Since substantial integration had occurred prior to court-ordered busing, it is fair to assume that this white flight cannot be attributed to latent racism, but to a decline in educational quality. From 1972 to 1982, 12% of the white students left the public-school system. Enrollments are still declining despite continued population growth. If present trends continue, by 1995 the white school population will have declined almost 25%.

Thirty-four private schools now serve Charlotte and surrounding Mecklenburg county. Almost every one was established after 1968. Neighboring county school systems and nearby South Carolina school districts have grown rapidly in the past 10 years because of their proximity to Charlotte. One public-school official believes that many of Charlotte's "best and brightest students" have been lost to the private-schools and that increases in private-school enrollment are directly related to forced busing.

Racial quotas are still required in some areas of school life, such as in the election of cheerleaders and school officers. Apparently, despite a decade of busing, protection by quota is still thought necessary to ensure that some blacks will be elected to leadership posts by the white majority.

An analysis of test-score statistics published in 1981 indicates that 10 years of busing have not succeeded in narrowing the educational gap between blacks and whites. Jane Scott, commenting on these scores in testimony before the Senate Subcommittee of Separation of Powers, contended that, "In virtually every category, the differential in the black and white scores is greater now" than when busing was ordered by the federal courts.

Since court-ordered busing was initiated in 1970, constant pupil reassignment has been necessary to maintain racial balance in the schools. The school board has had to adjust the assignment plan 11 times. This need to rework the plan has occurred because parents are reluctant to send their children to schools they consider inferior. Jay Robinson, the present school superintendent, believes that although racism may be a factor, concern for a child's education is the major reason. He says, "The one thing about pupil-assignment plans that has never worked is sending children from more affluent neighborhoods into lower income or deprived communities in the lower grades." This constant reshuffling has weakened many parents' commitment to the public-school system and caused them to opt for private schools.

TEST SCORES IMPROVE

Despite these problems, bright spots have appeared. Test scores rating student academic achievement have begun to rise after a significant plunge during the earlier years of busing. Although some critics have charged that a change in the type of test used caused the higher scores, school administrators believe better teaching methods and programs are the cause.

Scholastic Aptitude Tests (SAT) scores for Charlotte show encouraging results when measured against the same scores throughout the state. In 1983-84, Charlotte-Mecklenburg students averaged a combined score of 855—42 points below the national average but 28 points above North Carolina's average.

However, many Charlotteans still do not believe that a forced bus ride fosters learning, though the school board here has not chosen the voluntary approach being attempted in Norfolk. To be sure, Charlotte's experience has not been as traumatic as those of Boston and other cities. But even Julius Chambers and other supporters of forced busing concede that educational quality has suffered because of it.

Mr. HELMS. Predictably, the Charlotte Observer, the local morning newspaper owned by the Knight-Ridder chain, responded to the McMillan article with an editorial giving virtually unqualified support to busing. Among other things, the editorial declared that "even if academic achievement were at a lower level than it is, and even if white flight were more extensive," there is no acceptable alternative to busing.

Such statements by the Charlotte Observer and other busing promoters confirm what many have long suspected: that busing advocates have written off the neighborhood school for good. In their view, the neighborhood school is the enemy, and it alone is synonymous with segregation. A more dangerous notion for the future well-being of public education in this country—a system built on the neighborhood school—is hard to imagine.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Charlotte Observer editorial of January 28, 1985, entitled "Busing's Success: Consider the Alternative," be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSING'S SUCCESS—CONSIDER THE ALTERNATIVE

On today's Viewpoint page you'll find a column that appeared a week ago on the editorial page of the Wall Street Journal by Charlotte lawyer Ralph McMillan, who also writes periodic opinion columns for The Observer, Mr. McMillan challenges the notion that the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school system is "a shining example of how busing can succeed in accomplishing desegregation without lowering the quality of education."

Although he acknowledges the "relative success" of busing here, he asks: "But how necessary was busing in Charlotte and what is the bottom line when its costs and benefits are balanced against each other?"

He doesn't really answer those questions. Instead, he suggests that busing causes a significant amount of "white flight" to private schools. He also writes that "an analysis of testscore statistics published in 1981 indicates that 10 years of busing have not succeeded in narrowing the educational gap between blacks and whites."

ACADEMIC GAINS

Mr. McMillan's column is by no means a one-sided attack on the local schools. He acknowledges the gains in academic achievement as measured by standardized test scores in recent years. But some of his assertions are misleading.

If Mr. McMillan had looked at more recent figures he would have found the academic gap between black and white students closing significantly, with scores for both improving.

Statistics on the number of students enrolled in public and nonpublic schools in Charlotte and Mecklenburg County, and on the percentage of black students in the public schools, belie the suggestion that busing has led to extensive "white flight" or that white families continue to abandon the public schools in large numbers.

Any gross comparison of public school enrollment and black percentage over a period of time can and does reflect a number of factors other than "white flight," including changes in the number of school-age children in the community and the changing racial ratio within that number. A more accurate measure of "white flight" is the change in the number of students in non-public schools over the period.

The figures suggest that "white flight" has been triggered more by initial fear and uncertainty than by busing. From the 1968-69 school year, just before the 1970 court order that eventually led to busing, until the 1975-76 school year, one year after the final busing plan had been approved by the court and implemented, private school enrollment in Charlotte-Mecklenburg increased from about 2,150 to about 8,050. But since the school system's commitment to a busing plan and systemwide integration has been clear, that initial flood of white students from the public schools has become a trickle. Private school enrollment from the '75-'76 school year until last year increased from about 8,050 to only about 8,695.

DECLINING ENROLLMENTS

From 1971 until 1983, enrollment in the Charlotte-Mecklenburg schools—the 31st largest system in the nation—fell 11.2%.

Among the nation's 50 largest school systems, only four showed an increase in enrollment in that period, and 34 experienced larger declines in enrollment than Charlotte-Mecklenburg's.

For an example of serious "white flight" in a formerly segregated school system comparable in size to Charlotte-Mecklenburg's, consider the Nashville-Davidson County schools in Tennessee. There officials failed to maintain a consistent desegregation plan, and public school enrollment declined 27% between 1971 and 1983.

We would offer these answers to Mr. McMillan's questions:

Clearly, busing was necessary to eliminate segregation at all schools and maintain fairness and stability throughout the system. (Perhaps it's worth noting at this point that more than half the Charlotte-Mecklenburg students who ride school buses do so for reasons of convenience, not for purposes of integration.)

As to costs and benefits, we believe the alternative to busing, for now, is simply unacceptable—even if academic achievement were at a lower level than it is, and even if white flight were more extensive. No one really likes the idea of busing on the basis of race, of course. But without it, many schools would be essentially segregated by race, with the destabilizing possibility of more lawsuits. Such a system would be unfair to those students who found themselves part of a tiny black or tiny white minority in "neighborhood" schools. And instead of a consistent level of quality throughout the system, schools again would reflect their neighborhoods, varying widely in quality, status and parental support and expectations.

KEEPING A COMMITMENT

Most important of all is a point critics of busing never mention: Without busing, this community would have to abandon its commitment—court-ordered, but now widely accepted on merit—to remove from the public schools, root and branch, the unfair results of generations of enforced racial segregation in housing, employment and education.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, further confirmation that the views of the Charlotte Observer and other busing advocates are best characterized as elitist came just a few days after the above editorial appeared. A local representative to the North Carolina General Assembly, Ray Warren, suggested that a referendum be held in Mecklenburg County on school busing. His suggestion drew immediate objections from the professional staff of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school system. It also produced a column by the editor of the Charlotte Observer castigating Mr. Warren and arguing that his effectiveness as a legislator was jeopardized by even offering the idea.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a January 31, 1985, Charlotte Observer news article by Jim Morrill, entitled "Legislator Suggests Fall Referendum on School Busing," and a February 3, 1985, opinion column by Observer Editor Rich Oppel, entitled "When Silence Really Can Be Golden," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATOR SUGGESTS FALL REFERENDUM ON SCHOOL BUSING

(By Jim Morrill)

A Mecklenburg County legislator is exploring the possibility of putting a school busing referendum on the fall ballot.

Rep. Ray Warren, R-Mecklenburg, has asked Elections Supervisor Bill Culp to estimate the cost of a countywide referendum to accompany the Charlotte city elections in November.

President Reagan resurrected the issue in October during a Charlotte campaign appearance by calling busing an experiment that had failed.

His remarks were met by statements and editorials in The Charlotte News and The Observer defending Charlotte-Mecklenburg's 15-year-old integration plan. Of the system's 72,000 pupils, 12,000 are bused for integration.

"The school administrators and the Charlotte newspaper editors seem to think the community is supportive of busing," Warren said Tuesday. "I think they ought to have an opportunity to be vindicated in that belief. . . .

"Should the time come in the future when the school board is granted more flexibility to deal with busing, they would have a clear statement of public opinion to guide them," he said.

State elections officials say a nonbinding busing referendum—essentially a straw vote—would require General Assembly approval to get on the ballot.

School officials reacted strongly Tuesday to a possible referendum.

"I think this type of thing will very much polarize the community," said Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools Supt. Jay Robinson. "I certainly don't believe that most people in the community want children bused. But I seriously doubt that the majority of people want to return to segregated schools."

"I cannot imagine it serving a useful purpose," school board Chairperson Carrie Winter said. "I think most people are very proud of what's been achieved by the goodheartedness of this community."

Warren said a referendum "might give people hope that they can have input into the education of their children again."

Charlotte-Mecklenburg's pupil assignment plan is the result of a federal court order requiring integration. Warren, a public school graduate, said he believes future, more conservative courts could allow cities like Charlotte to stop busing programs.

Robinson said the current program exceeds court-mandated standards.

"I don't think our plan anymore is a question of what the courts say," he said. "Either you believe in integration or you don't and if you do, you do what it takes to see that all the schools have some integration, more than just tokenism."

Sen. Larry Cobb, R-Mecklenburg, declined comment on the possibility of a busing referendum but said he generally sees little value in straw votes.

"I'm not going to salute that flag, let's put it that way," Cobb said. "My feeling (about busing) is that the school system was set back initially and it has overcome those problems and is in pretty good shape."

Asked if a referendum would reopen wounds, Warren said, "If (people) feel that way they should blame the school board and the Charlotte Observer editorial writers and all the other people who are talking about how wonderful things are . . . and trying to make us a national pro-busing model."

WHEN SILENCE REALLY CAN BE GOLDEN

(By Richard Oppel)

Freshman state Rep. Ray Warren's anti-busing proposal brings to mind a piece of wisdom given new legislators since the time they rode to the nation's state capitals in buckboards. It's called Coughlin's Law: Don't talk unless you can improve the silence.

The N.C. General Assembly convenes Tuesday. The stakes are enormous for Mecklenburg County. We should be optimistic, but recognize the fragility of politics in Raleigh.

One, Mecklenburg has the good fortune to have in the governor's mansion a local man, Jim Martin, who is a capable, experienced legislator with broad knowledge of local, state and federal government. Yet, he is a Republican in a Democratic world and the holder of an office with comparatively little power.

OUR GROWTH PAINS

Two, our county faces mounting problems of growth and urbanization that require increasing coordination between state and local officials. Yet, this teamwork must be developed within an environment—the N.C. General Assembly—historically controlled by rural interests who do not share our problems.

Three, Mecklenburg voters chose in 1984 to abandon legislators of power and experience—Sens. Craig Lawing and Cecil Jenkins and Reps. Parks Helms, Louise Brennan and Jim Black—in favor of people who are mostly untested.

These add up to a need for caution by our legislative delegation. The lawmakers must forge a strong relationship with Gov. Martin's office. They must work to earn credibility with their General Assembly colleagues. They must gain the confidence and trust of local Mecklenburg officials.

That is why Rep. Warren's comments on busing are dismaying. He told Observer reporter Jim Morrill on Tuesday that he had asked Elections Supervisor Bill Culp to estimate the cost of a countywide school busing referendum to accompany the Charlotte city elections in November.

"The school administrators and the Charlotte newspaper editors seem to think the community is supportive of busing. I think they ought to have an opportunity to be vindicated in that belief," said Warren.

We have a fine public school system. Our 15-year-old Integration plan has worked. Of the system's 72,000 pupils almost 50,000 are bused but only about 12,000 for purposes of integration. Our system is a model for the nation. New industry is attracted by the harmony of the community. And desegregated schools are the law of the land.

What does Rep. Warren wish to accomplish? The reopening of old wounds? A return to a dual system, which would inevitably happen if school officials could not adjust enrollments to account for shifting residential patterns?

I choose not to debate the merits of desegregated schools here. But I question the logic of Warren's apparent social agenda as a freshman legislator.

In a letter published Jan. 4 in The Observer, the 27-year-old Warren appealed for bipartisanship and teamwork between Piedmont Democrats and Republicans to provide the best representation for their constituents. Said the Mint Hill lawyer.

"It is far too early to herald the arrival of an era of diminished legislative effectiveness for Mecklenburg and other Piedmont counties. Together, Piedmont Republicans and Democrats have the numerical strength to promote the interests of our part of the state."

Maybe so, but Warren's first steps would surely threaten his effectiveness in our legislative delegation. Veteran lawmakers quickly dismiss noisy ideologues among a freshman class in favor of those who are willing to work hard, and do so quietly, until they know enough about the legislature to lead. It is especially easy to dismiss one when the ideologue is a Republican amid a Democratic majority.

Warren has been active in conservative causes since he was s student at UNC-Wilmington in the late 1970s. He has been a consistent opponent of racial quotas at universities and other policies he viewed as racial discrimination. He has written intelligent and passionate letters to this newspaper.

NOT CAMPUS POLITICS

But campus politics are a far cry from representing the largest county in North Carolina in the General Assembly.

Gov. Martin has a record of mainstream Republican pragmatism. In modern times, local Mecklenburg officials have approached policy issues with a nonpartisan, progressive spirit.

If Rep. Warren or his fellow Mecklenburg freshmen attempt to achieve their own political goals with an agenda that has little to do with the future of our county, they should know the huge, potential cost to Mecklenburg's 450,000 residents—in roads, university money, public works projects and tax reform.

Mr. HELMS. Why, I ask, Mr. President, are those who think schoolbusing is such a good thing for our society and our schoolchildren afraid to hear from the people on this matter—white and black alike? Why do they want to keep the lid on what is obviously serious dissatisfaction with forced busing by the American people?

Mr. President, I do not pretend to have the answers to these questions. But I am convinced that if we do not let the public be heard on busing and if those with the political power to do something about it fail to heed the counsel of the people, the American public school system will never achieve the levels of excellence which our children and our grandchildren deserve. They will be shortchanged, and they will rightly blame those who abandoned the neighborhood school.

That is why, Mr. President, this Senator will continue to sponsor legislation curbing forced busing and restoring the neighborhood school. The professional elites may hope that forced busing has now become a permanent party of public education, but as long as Congress has the power to act in this matter, this Senator will be pushing for appropriate solutions.

DEATH OF SENATOR LISTER HILL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I join my colleagues today in paying my respects to a senatorial legend, Joseph Lister Hill. My condolences go to his wife, Henrietta M. Hill, and his children, Luther Lister Hill and Henrietta Hubbard.

But while we sorrow in the loss of the public servant, and join in sympathy for his relatives and close friends, it is fully appropriate that we celebrate the memory and the career of Senator Hill. He was a man who accomplished a great deal for the people of his beloved State of Alabama, his Nation, and for mankind.

For 45 years, from 1923 to 1968, Mr. Hill proudly represented Alabama in the Congress of the United States. He served 15 years in the House, and 30 years in this Chamber. From the administration of President Calvin Coolidge to the administration of President Lyndon Johnson, he was here building and creating.

On a great proportion of the monumental legislation enacted during that period, one will find Lister Hill's name as a sponsor. On the legislation establishing the Tennessee Valley Authority, it is there. On the Rural Housing Act, the National Security Act, the Rural Telephone Act, the Social Security Act, the legislation creating Medicare, and the GI bill of rights for veterans of World War II and the Korean conflict—his name is on all them.

In 1940, Senator Hill placed the name of President Franklin Roosevelt into nomination for President of the United States with the words: "His heart made him the friend of the lowly. His deeds show him to be a friend of all, both great and small." These words as easily and as accurately could have been said about himself.

Lister Hill's chief concern, throughout his congressional career, was improving the quality of life of all his fellow Americans, regardless of economic status.

A long-time advocate of education, in 1955, Senator Hill sponsored legislation to provide Federal aid to education so that no American child would grow up unable to read or write. He also pointed out that the country was failing to train and develop what he termed "our top talent." "If we continue to neglect our schools," he warned, "5 years from now the Russians will be ahead of us."

The Soviet Union became the first nation to launch a satellite into orbit 2 years later. In response, Senator Hill was instrumental in drafting and sponsoring the National Defense Education Act. In words that we would do well to recall today, Senator Hill told us:

Our schools are the backbone of defense of our country, the bulwark of the American enterprise system, and the foundation of a trained and loyal American citizenship.

Lister Hill's greatest accomplishments, and his greatest glory, however, came in his efforts to assure that all Americans would have access to quality health care. One Congress alone enacted more than 20 "Hill bills," as they were known, to improve the public's health. Upon his retirement from the Senate in 1968, Senator Hill received a special Lasker Award for guiding "more than 80 major pieces of health legislation" to passage during his congressional career.

In his efforts to reduce the pain and suffering of illness and injury, he sponsored legislation for increased research into the cause, cure, and prevention of cancer, mental illness, heart disease, arthritis, and other crippling and killing diseases. He sponsored legislation for medical professions' training and education.

And Senator Hill sponsored the legislation that bears his name, the Hill-Burton Act of 1946, which provided Federal funds for the construction of medical facilities, primarily in rural and poverty areas. Today, more than 9,200 medical facilities throughout the United States, many of them in poor and rural areas, owe their existence to this act.

The honorary names he was given, the Senate's "Statesman for Health," the "Leader for the Public's Health," "Mr. Health," and the "Father of the National Institutes of Health, speak for themselves.

"There are millions of our people who are better off today," said President Lyndon Johnson, "and millions who will be better off in the future," because of the work of Senator Hill. Senator Hill "has done more for the public's health than any American in history," read an article in Harper's magazine, in 1959.

The congressional career of Senator Lister Hill is one of those instances in history when the lives of millions of persons have been improved and made more comfortable by the efforts of one man.

The State of Alabama, the U.S. Senate, and the United States lost much with his retirement from public life, and now with his passing. But Senator Lister Hill left such a legacy from his days of public service, that he will never truely leave us.

He has set an example for all of us who seek to do the public's work.

BIRTH OF ASHLEY HANSEN RIEGLE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I announce to my colleagues that a new Democrat has been brought forth.

On February 1, Ashley Hansen Riegle was born. The proud parents are the senior Senator from Michigan, DONALD RIEGLE, and his wife, Lori Hansen Riegle.

As always, I am pleased to announce a birth. Being a parent myself, I know the joy that such a happy event brings, and the many years of pleasure that will come.

I wish the baby and the mother the best of health. I give the Senator my heartiest congratulations.

SENATOR CLAIBORNE PELL ON CONSENSUS IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, last week the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations held its opening round of hearings on "The Future of American Foreign Policy."

These hearings could not have been held at a more opportune time. For as our distinguished colleague, Senator CLAIBORNE PELL, the ranking Democrat on the committee observed in his opening remarks:

With the advent of a new chairmanship—and of a Presidency with a renewed mandate—the hope naturally arises that we might be able to achieve in the future a greater degree of consensus in foreign policy then has characterized the recent past.

Senator PELL noted that the goal of consensus in American foreign policy was a worthy aspiration and one which he, and I believe all Members of the Senate share. However, he offered us some very wise words of caution when he pointed out:

Just as I believe no Senator should support or oppose the President purely for reasons of party, I believe also that no Member of Congress should feel compelled to support the President simply because he is President.

In making this observation Senator PELL DREW UPON THE INTENT OF OUR FOUNDING FATHERS WHO ALLOCATED THE FOREIGN POLICY POWER TO BOTH THE EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE BRANCHES OF OUR GOVERNMENT WHEN THEY DRAFTED OUR CONSTITUTION. CITING THE DISTINGUISHED HISTORIAN EDWARD CORWIN, THE SENATOR NOTED THAT:

Far from creating a clean separation of power, Corwin said, the Constitution extended "an invitation"—to the President and to Congress—"to struggle for the privilege of directing American foreign policy."

On May 16, 1983, in a speech on this floor, I reminded my colleagues that having thrown off the yoke of tyranny, our Founding Fathers were determined that our fledgling Nation would never again suffer the abuses of a monarch vested with absolute power. In so doing, they constructed a system of government in which the three branches were delicately balanced, each against the other two.

For the Founding Fathers, Congress had a unique role to play since they viewed it as an institution reflecting the voice of the people and as the bulwark of American democratic ideals. I note that the first article of the Constitution deals exclusively with the legislative branch and its powers. The Founding Fathers, in light of our colonial experience, were justifiably suspicious of executive power, and this was reflected in the noble instrument they drafted and which we know as the Constitution of the United States of America.

As Senator PELL pointed out, the Founding Fathers accorded the Congress a significant role in the conduct of this Nation's foreign policy. And as Senator PELL so eloquently stated:

* * * Ultimately we must accept a truth about consensus that proceeds from the very meaning of the word: that we will achieve consensus when we can reach agreement, and we will lack consensus when we can't. That is what the Founding Fathers envisaged for our constitutional system and that, I trust, is the way it shall continue to operate.

I urge my colleagues to weigh very carefully the views of our distinguished colleague on the issue of consensus in American foreign policy. They are a timely reminder that the Senate has a special responsibility to heed the warning of Senator PELL who has reminded us that: "* * * Ultimately Congress must judge the President's policy on its merits."

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Mr. PELL's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CLAIBORNE PELL

Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate you on the assumption of your new responsibilities, and to underscore my intent to work with you in a spirit of cooperation. In this regard, I was pleased to concur with your desire to commence your chairmanship—and the second Reagan Administration—with this series of hearings aimed at addressing the broad questions and principles underlying American foreign policy.

With the advent of a new chairmanship—and of a presidency with a renewed mandate—the hope naturally arises that we might be able to achieve in the future a greater degree of consensus in foreign policy than has characterized the recent past. This is a worthy aspiration, which I share. But on the subject of consensus, I do believe a few cautionary words are in order.

With tongue in cheek, the British statesman Disraeli once described his idea of an agreeable person as a person who agreed with him. The concept of consensus in foreign policy is subject to the same tendency. As the President seeks agreement from Congress, or as one political grouping finds itself opposed by another, there is often a temptation to label as disagreeable—or irresponsible—those from whom one cannot elicit concurrence. While such accusations inevitably arise in our political process, we ought to keep them in perspective.

It first bears emphasis that the absence of consensus generally has little to do with excessive partisanship. As a case in point, we need look only to the current dispute between the Senate Republican leadership and the Defense Secretary over the national military budget, a question central to foreign policy. A second topical example is the disagreement between the Republican-controlled Senate and the Administration over aid to the Nicaraguan contras. Historically, I recall vividly the controversy over Vietnam, when opposition to the Johnson Administration arose first among Senate Democrats.

My second point about consensus concerns the role of Congress. Just as I believe no Senator should support or oppose the President purely for reasons of party, I believe also that no member of Congress should feel compelled to support the President simply because he is President. There is, I believe, a normal predisposition in Congress to support the President by reason of his responsibilities as head of state, head of government, and commander-in-chief. But ultimately Congress must judge the President's policy on the merits.

Some fifty years ago, the distinguished historian Edward Corwin gave us a classic description of the way the Founding Fathers had allocated foreign policy power to the executive and legislative branches. Far from creating a clean separation of power, Corwin said, the Constitution extended "an invitation"—to the President and to Congress—"to struggle for the privilege of directing American foreign policy." Throughout our history, this struggle has been waged, sometimes yielding a period of executive or legislative supremacy, sometimes abating for a period of relative tranquility, but always eventually resuming, in a phenomenon reminiscent of a phrase from the Roman poet Horace, who spoke of "harmony in discord." This, I believe, is precisely what the Founding Fathers intended.

And so, Mr. Chairman, as these hearings begin, I join with you in searching for areas of common ground on which we can base the future of American foreign policy. But ultimately we must accept a truth about consensus that proceeds from the very meaning of the word: that we will achieve consensus when we can reach agreement, and we will lack consensus when we can't. That is what the Founding Fathers envisaged for our constitutional system and that, I trust, is the way it shall continue to operate.

Mr. Secretary, I join with Chairman Lugar in welcoming you here today.

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE YALTA CONFERENCE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, this week marks the 40th anniversary of the Yalta Conference among Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and Joseph Stalin, the leaders of the wartime coalition against Nazi Germany.

Conferences are not often remembered, except by historians, for all too often they do little more than ratify reality. But the Yalta Conference is different, and its anniversary merits attention.

Yalta did not ratify reality; it helped shape it, and it did so in large measure because the Western powers did not fully comprehend the nature of Soviet foreign policy. Like any diplomatic conference, the Yalta meetings resulted in statements which were deliberately euphemistic and subject to some degree of misinterpretation. But a significant number of the pledges offered by the Soviet Union at the Yalta Conference were crystal clear: Guarantees of free elections, of fundamental human rights, and of an end to the sphere-of-interest politics which had twice plunged Europe into world war.

What happened? The answer is obvious to anybody. First, the United States simply failed to understand the nature of the Soviet Union, and it accepted the best possible interpretation of vague and euphemistic commitments. Thus, shortly after returning from Yalta, President Roosevelt told Congress that the Conference meant the end of spheres of influence, and that Europe would be free. The Soviet interpretation, of course, was exactly the opposite. So Yalta was an early reminder of something we should never forget when dealing with the Soviets: Where an agreement leaves any room for error, the Soviets will construe it to their own advantage.

More importantly, however, Yalta simply represented the Soviet penchant for the diplomacy of the lie, and for policies of naked power. The free elections never materialized. First Poland, then Czechoslovakia—both countries which had fought against Germany—were occupied and brought into the Soviet bloc through puppet governments. The wartime enemies of Germany were treated no differently than Germany's allies. Whether a country was "liberated" by the Russians or whether it was defeated by the Russians, the result was the same.

To this day, we live with the consequences of the Yalta Conference. The dividing line between the Warsaw Pact and NATO reflects the final battle lines of the various Allied Powers in World War II. Two generations of Americans and Europeans have come of age without knowing a free Europe, at peace with itself. As Zbigniew Brzezinski points out in a brilliant article in the most recent edition of Foreign Affairs, the division of Europe which resulted from Yalta is both artificial and dangerous. It serves as the justification for the state of armed truce which characterizes Europe today, and it is justified by it.

The situation in Europe is not natural, and it is not something we should celebrate. We have made the best of a bad situation, and we should continue to do so for as long as necessary. But the perpetual tensions along the inter-German frontier, the vast amount of treasure poured into the NATO alliance, and the periodic disputes among NATO members over such questions as burden sharing are the daily price we pay for the Yalta Conference. Moreover, military tensions are not the only price. As a Polish Americannd all other Eastern Europeans, including Jews who must live under Moscow's definition of liberty, is another legacy of Yalta.

So long as Europe is effectively divided into two armed camps reflecting spheres of influence—so long, in other words, as the legacy of Yalta remains with us—we cannot take much satisfaction. The costs of Yalta's legacy are too high, and the benefits accrue only to Stalin's heirs.

Simply put, Mr. President, we went to Yalta with high hopes, and we came back with broken promises and outright lies. We have lived too long with the consequences, and we are paying the price every day. As other Senators have suggested, it is time to make clear that we do not accept Yalta's legacy, for the legacy is not what we were told it would be. Contracts are not valid if one party fails to live up to their terms. The contract we thought we had signed at Yalta has never been effective, for the Russians set out immediately to break its terms. Under the circumstances, we are foolish to continue to treat the Yalta agreement as anything more than a broken artifact of other times.

Does this mean that we should seek the dismantling of current borders? Of course not. It would be foolhearty to try, and we are bound as well by the Helsinki agreement which finally put an end to World War II.

But Europe is more than boundaries and borders. It is a collective entity, and not just an accumulation of governments. The course of history has persistently led to the emergence of a cultural and regional whole. There was a Europe long before there were separate nation-states, and things are no different today. When Charles de-Gaulle spoke of "Europe from the Atlantic to the Urals," he was being factual, not visionary.

Governments and borders matter, and they must be bolstered. But they are not the only things which animate people. Common visions, common cultures, and common beliefs can and do transcend national borders. That is why, for instance, the NATO alliance is an Atlantic alliance, and not simply a European organization. It is why we in this country look with awe on the works of such masters as Brahms, Chopin, Goethe, and others. It is why Pope John Paul II speaks to the hearts of so many Europeans, Catholic, and non-Catholic alike.

In short, as Dr. Brzezinski argues, Europe can become European, even while we recognize the borders and boundaries which define the nation-states of Europe, eastern and western alike. As Dr. Brzezinski argues, we can repudiate Yalta's legacy, and should do so if we want to end the artificial division of Europe which carries with it such profound costs. But in doing so, we cannot repudiate the course of history which has pointed for centuries toward a Europe which is united by bonds of belief. The Helsinki agreement recognizes this by specifying that human rights are a transcendent concern of all nations, and not the domestic concern of sovereign nations free to tyrannize their citizens. Helsinki recognizes borders, but it recognizes a common Europe as well, a Europe defined by such fundamentals as human liberty and shared culture.

If we repudiate Yalta's legacy while bolstering our commitment to the vision of Helsinki, we can begin, however slowly, to move toward the time when President Roosevelt's belief that the world should be free of spheres of influence is fact, not fantasy. The process will take time, but if we do not begin to invest that time, we are doomed to live in a world divided and to pour our national treasure into the means by which to keep it so. There is really no choice. We owe it to ourselves, and to our brethren in the Eastern European countries, to come up with a better vision of the future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Zbigniew Brzezinski, which I have mentioned, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FUTURE OF YALTA

(By Zbigniew Brzezinski)

Yalta is unfinished business. It has a longer past and it may have a more ominous future than is generally recognized. Forty years after the fateful Crimean meeting of February 4-11, 1945, between the Allied Big Three of World War II, much of our current preoccupation with Yalta focuses on its myth rather than on its continuing historical significance.

The myth is that at Yalta the West accepted the division of Europe. The fact is that Eastern Europe had been conceded de facto to Josef Stalin by Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill as early as the Teheran Conference (in November-December 1943), and at Yalta the British and American leaders had some halfhearted second thoughts about that concession. They then made a last-ditch but ineffective effort to fashion some arrangements to assure at least a modicum of freedom for East Europe, in keeping with Anglo-American hopes for democracy on the European continent as a whole. The Western statesmen failed, however, to face up to the ruthlessness of the emerging postwar Soviet might, and in the ensuring clash between Stalinist power and Western naivete, power prevailed.

Yalta's continuing significance lies in what it reveals about Russia's enduring ambitions toward Europe as a whole. Yalta was the last gasp of carefully calibrated Soviet diplomacy designed to obtain Anglo-American acquiescense to a preponderant Soviet role in all of Europe. At Yalta, in addition to timidly reopening the issue of Eastern Europe, the West also deflected, but again in a vague and timorous fashion, Soviet aspirations for a dominant position in the western extremity of the Eurasian land mass.

Yalta thus remains of great geopolitical significance because it symbolized the unfinished struggle for the future of Europe. Forty years after Yalta that struggle still involves America and Russia, but by now it should be clear that the issue is unlikely to be resolved in a historically constructive manner until a more active role is assumed by the very object of the contest, Europe itself.

II

The setting for Yalta was prostrated Europe. That once globally dominant civilization had committed historical suicide in the course of two devastating wars fought within the span of a mere quarter-century. When the two leaders of the British and American democracies met with the Georgian tyrant of the Great Russian Empire to resolve the future of Europe, continental Europe was absent from the deliberations. In the meantime, much of Europe's future was being decided on the ground, by the great extra-European armies pushing from the east and the west into Germany, the heart of Europe.

Until Yalta, the key issue perplexing the wartime alliance was Poland, the key to control of Eastern Europe. Thereafter, the issue has increasingly been Germany, the key to control over Western Europe. Poland represented to Moscow the gate to the West, and thus the Kremlin in its wartime diplomacy adopted an attitude of utter intransigence on the question of Poland's future. Though in his memoirs Churchill later described the Polish issue as "the first of the great causes which led to the breakdown of the Grand Alliance," neither he nor his Atlantic partner, President Roosevelt, seemed to grasp the central strategic importance of the Polish issue; nor was either of them inclined to exploit Russia's initial weakness to obtain a satisfactory resolution of the Polish-Soviet dispute, initiated by the Soviet seizure of almost half of Poland in 1939 as a result of the Stalin-Ribbentrop agreement.

Stalin correctly saw in the territorial dispute the opportunity to transform Polish independence into dependence on Moscow. So did the Poles. Prior to the Teheran meeting, the Polish prime minister desperately warned Churchill (as recorded by Sir William Strang on September 9, 1943) that "what was at stake between Poland and Russia was not merely a question of frontiers but a question of general relations and indeed the question of the survival of Poland as an independent state. . . ."[1] A month later, Foreign Minister Anthony Eden reported to the British War Cabinet that the Polish prime minister had told him on October 6, "The general attitude of Stalin towards Poland, towards Germany and the Free German movement and towards questions touching other occupied countries, as well as his record and his whole mentality, implied more extensive ambitions than ambitions only in the eastern provinces of Poland which were strategically important to Poland but in no sense vital to Russia." Finally, on the eve of the Teheran meeting, Eden briefed the War Cabinet on November 22 that the Poles feared "that Russia's long-term aim is to set up a puppet government in Warsaw and turn Poland into a Soviet republic. . . ."

The British took a more benign view of Stalin's goals. Eden assured the Poles "that British experience suggested that Stalin was much less intransigent . . .," and his internal memorandum on preparations for the forthcoming Teheran Conference makes it clear that the United Kingdom was prepared to satisfy Stalihurchill and Roosevelt agreed to changes in the Polish frontiers, without any further consultation with the Poles, and more generally conceded to Moscow a preponderant role in the Balkans.

To make matters worse, while pressing the Poles to make territorial concessions to Moscow in the hope of assuaging Russian desires, the British and Americans were unwilling to offer the Poles any assurances regarding compensation in the West. Adopting the position that changes in Germany's frontiers must await the end of the war, London and Washington made the Polish plight more desperate. As a result, most Poles simply refused any compromise on the grounds that a truncated Poland could not survive as an independent entity, while others, shocked and embittered, increasingly saw in Moscow the only sponsor of major Polish territorial acquisition of Germany territory as a compensation for what was to be absorbed by Russia. The price, however, was the inevitable emergence of Polish dependence on Russia, and through it Soviet domination over Eastern Europe.

By the time of Yalta, not only was Poland occupied by the Red Army, but a new government, sponsored by Stalin, had been installed in Warsaw. At Yalta, the West exacted Soviet promises that the Soviet-installed government would be enlarged and would hold free elections, following which the West would recognize it, but Western leaders agreed not to have any binding obligations regarding the elections inserted into the joint communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Yalta Conference. As a result, how free elections were to be organized remained an exclusive Soviet prerogative, with the outcome thereby predetermined. (Indeed, the Western powers recognized the Warsaw government in mid-1945, even though—contrary to the Yalta agreement—no elections had been held.)

III

By finally foreclosing the issue of Poland in Russia's favor, Yalta opened the battle for the future of Germany. Eastern Poland had been incorporated into the Soviet Union, but the West continued to oppose major Polish expansion at Germany's expense. The Russians at first hesitated in deciding how extensively they ought to support Polish claims. But at the Potsdam Conference in July 1945, following Germany's final collapse, Stalin apparently concluded that with his armies firmly implanted in the middle of Germany he could afford to satisfy Polish needs (thereby permanently cementing Polish dependence on Russia), while continuing to wage his struggle for a preeminent Soviet role in Western Europe.

For Stalin, that struggle was the vital substance of his wartime alliance with the West. Late in 1943, on the eve of the Teheror a Central European confederation which might have presented an obstacle to Soviet domination over the region.

The Teheran Conference further nurtured Stalin's grandiose hopes that the British would be unable and the Americans unwilling to oppose his larger designs, which he revealed cautiously, while continuously probing the intentions and the will of his British and American interlocutors. Throughout, Stalin and his associates skillfully played on the anti-imperialist sentiments of the Americans to weaken the British role in any postwar arrangements and on the British rivalry with France to make certain that no center of effective power would emerge in postwar Europe. In the Soviet interpretation, Roosevelt's penchant for speaking of the world's "four policemen" could have had only one geopolitical meaning: America's central concern would be the Western Hemisphere, a weak China would be preoccupied with its own problems, and a bankrupt Britain would be enmeshed in its imperial dilemmas, leaving most of Eurasia to the care of the fourth policeman.

In testing western reactions to his design, Stalin used as bait two somewhat varying schemes for Europe. Though one will never know to what extent these plans were alternative scenarios or competing concepts, both plans provided for a major Soviet role in all of Europe. The two options were succinctly summed up in a conversation on August 31, 1943, between British Foreign Minister Eden and the Soviet ambassador to London, Ivan Maisky, as reported by Eden:

. . . Maisky continued that there were two possible ways of trying to organize Europe after the war. Either we could agree each to have a sphere of interest, the Russians in the East and ourselves and the Americans in the West. He did not himself think this was a good plan, but if it were adopted we should be at liberty to exclude the Russians from French Affairs, the Mediterranean and so forth, and the Russians would claim similar freedom in the East. If, on the other hand, we would both, and the United States also, agree that all Europe was one, as his Government would greatly prefer, then we must each admit the right of the other to an interest in all parts of Europe. If we were concerned with Czechoslovakia and Poland, and the United States with the Baltic States, then we must understand Russian concern in respect of France and the Mediterranean. . . .[2]

The latter variant was apparently advocated at least until Yalta by Maxim Litvinov, the former Soviet Commissar for Foreign Affairs and former ambassador to Washington. Postulated on the unstated assumption that America would disengage militarily from Europe but that at least a semblance of congeniality between the Soviet Union and its principal wartime allies would continue even after the war, and bound to appeal to the idealistic American dislike of spheres of influence, the plan envisaged not only a Soviet role in all of occupied Germany but in effect a thinly camouflaged arrangement for a Europe dominated indirectly by the Soviet Union, the only effective power in the region. British influence was to be confined to several narrow maritime enclaves, France was to play a negligible role, while continued Soviet-American accommodation would be tacitly premised on American noninvolvement in European affairs. There can be little doubt that the Soviets took seriously Roosevelt's repeated hints both at Teheran and even later at Yalta that the United States would not maintain a postwar military presence in Europe. Given their ideological cast, they must also have been reassured by Roosevelt's tendency to speak privately to Stalin in most negative terms both of the British and of the French, seeing in that confirmation of their theory of "inherent capitalist contradictions."

The alternative to this strategy of domination through Western acquiescence was associated with Litvinov's principal rival and successor at the helm for foreign affairs, Vyacheslav Molotov. It took more for granted that an American-Soviet collision would eventually occur, presumably after the expected U.S. disengagement from Europe and probably in the context of sharpened intercapitalist conflicts. Molotov's alternative strategy of exclusive control by fait accompli put more emphasis, therefore, on directly subordinating eastern Europe and as much of central Europe as possible, while vigorously asserting Soviet claims to a major role in the West and to a coequal veto-wielding status in relations with the United States. In more specific discussions regarding postwar arrangements for Germany, Stalin was careful to keep his options open. At times he seemed to be favoring a central German government, at other times he would opt for the fragmentation of Germany into several constituent states. In either case, he was always insistent that the Soviet Union have a major say in all of Germany, while making certain that no major West European power was reconstituted.

As the Soviet armies marched westward, Stalin's claims became more explicit both territorially and politically. In addition to retaining everything seized during the collaboration with Hitler, by late 1944 and early 1945 the Soviet Union made territorial demands on Norway (Bear Island and the Spitzbergen) and regarding the Far East (southern Sakhalin, the Kurile Islands, and a preponderant role in Manchuria and Outer Mongolia). Stalin also sought a share in controlling Tangier and a slice of the Italian colonies on the Mediterranean, in addition to proposals for joint action against Franco's Spain and increased political pressure on neutral Switzerland and Sweden. This was followed later by demands for territorial concessions by Turkey. Moreover, the Soviets consistently spoke of France as totally demoralized and worthless, underlining the proposition that Europe was a political vacuum.

Anglo-American surprise and protracted failure to come to grips with the scope of these Soviet ambitions is all the more remarkable when one considers the extent to which Stalin's aspirations mirrored traditional Russian goals. Indeed, they so closely replicated Tsarist objectives in World War I that one may suspect that old Russian planning papers were disinterred for Stalin's and Molotov's use. Some 30 years later, in late 1914, the Russian Council of Ministers had also considered the related problems of Poland and of Russian postwar objectives. The majority report focused on the restoration of a Polish kingdom, but under Imperial Russian sway, as Russia's major postwar objective. However, the minority report prepared by the more reactionary members went beyond that priority and defined Russian war objectives much more ambitiously.

Russia's general aims were stated as involving the "strengthening of Russia herself, in an ethnic, economic and strategic way"; in addition to "the possible weakening of Germanism as the chief enemy of Slavdom and Russia at the present time"; and to "the possible liberation of other Slavic peoples from the authority of Germany and Austria-Hungary (insofar as such liberation does not conflict with the direct interests of Russia)." To accomplish the above, Russia was to attain the following specific goals in order of importance:

(1) Completion of the historic task of uniting all sections of the Russian people by reuniting eastern Galicia, northern Bukovina and Carpathian Rus' with Russia.

(2) Realization of the historic tasks of Russia in the Black Sea by the annexation of Tsar'grad (Constantinople) and the Turkish Straits.

(3) Rectification of the borders of the Russian state at the expense of East Prussia and also in Asiatic Turkey.

(4) The weakening of Germany internally in every possible way by means of her complete territorial reconstruction on a new basis, with a possible decrease in Prussian territory to the advantage of France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Denmark and the smaller German states as well, and, perhaps, the restoration of the Kingdom of Hanover, Hesse-Nassau, etc.

(5) Unification and liberation of Poland within the widest possible boundaries, but, in any case, within limits which are ethnographic rather than historic (which would be contrary to the basic interest and entire history of Russia).

(6) Liberation of the remaining Austrian Slavs.[3]

What is striking about these war aims, drafted by the more nationalistic and reactionary members of the Council, is their identity with Soviet post-World War II objectives defined by Stalin and Molotov. Every one of the objectives became Stalin's: the incorporation of parts of Polish Galicia never previously held by Russia and of Czechoslovak Sub-Carpathia were identical with the first 1914 goal; the second objective was denied to the Soviets, but they did press for it in their conversations with the Western allies (presumably recalling that in the spring of 1915 France and Britain had conceded as much to Tsarist Russia); the third objective was obtained in East Prussia (again a surprise to Westerners), and the Soviets in 1945 pressed for territorial concessions from Turkey but without success; the fourth was achieved in a different form in Germany; the fifth pushed Poland further west than was thought possible in 1914 but with functionally the same result—the creation of a Poland highly dependent on Russia for its territorial integrity.

One can thus classify Soviet wartime objectives as falling into three categories: first, recovery of the territorial status quo ante as of June 1941; second, securing politically acquiescent regimes in east-central Europe; third, gaining a preponderant voice regarding the political organization of the rest of Europe. The Soviets were totally unyielding and quite open about the first objective; they were prepared, however, to camouflage the second objective if it served to promote the attainment of the third goal. It is easy to forget how uncertain at the time was America's postwar role in Europe, while American unwillingness during wartime to focus concretely on postwar issues fortified the expectation that it would again turn inward. As Soviet forces moved westward, their pursuit of the second objective became more brazen, and it assumed brutal manifestations when it dawned upon the Soviets that there might not be an American acquiescence to the attainment of the third objective. That realization dawned on Stalin and his colleagues with increasing intensity after Yalta.

Yalta can therefore be said to have initiated the postwar struggle for Europe. Yet it was hailed in the West as an unmitigated diplomatic triumph, foreshadowing a period of prolonged East-West accommodation. Forty years later this very same Yalta continues to evoke equally simplistic—though opposite—emotions. It is now the synonym for betrayal. At the time its decisions were said (according to a New York Times editorial of February 13, 1945) to "justify and surpass most of the hopes placed on this fateful meeting. . . they show the way to an early victory in Europe, to a secure peace and to a brighter world."

Sumner Wells might be accused of some partiality when he announced (in The Washington Post on February 28, 1945) that ". . . the Declaration of Yalta, whatever the future may bring forth, will always stand out as a gigantic step forward toward the ultimate establishment of a peaceful and orderly world." But even such an experienced observer as Walter Lippmann was not to be outdone. Writing in The New York Herald Tribune on February 15, 1945, Lippmann informed his readers that Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt "have checked and reversed the normal tendency of a victorious coalition to dissolve as the war, which called it into being, approaches its end. . . . The military alliance is proving itself to be no transitory thing, good only in the presence of a common enemy, but in truth the nucleus and core of a new international order."

Skeptical voices were few and far between. The Wall Street Journal warned on February 16, 1945, that the Yalta deal on central Europe "can only lead to increasingly unsatisfactory relations between the United States and Russia"; while a perceptive Frenchman, Andre Visson, (writing in The Washington Post on February 18, 1945, in an article entitled "Big Powers and Small Nations") noted that the United States was finally becoming committed to the future of Europe and was showing signs of a willingness even to contest the Soviet domination over Eastern Europe—unlike at Teheran, where it seemed uninterested in postwar arrangements and willing to settle for "the division of Europe into two zones of influence."

In fact, Yalta was the last effrot by the wartime partners to consturct the postwar world jointly. Unlike Teheran, where Churchill was still clearly Roosevelt's equal, at Yalta the lead was taken by the Americans, foreshadowing the bipolar world that was in fact emerging. The real collision at Yalta was between Roosevelt's well-meaning vaguenesss about arrangements for Europe's postwar future and Stalin's studied vagueness about the extent of Russia's desire to dominate that future. The former desperately wnated to believe in postwar cooperation while the latter deliberately exploited that faith to create facts on the ground while pressing for Western acceptance of Soviet claims in both the west and the far east of the Eurasian continent.

As a result, the Yalta declarations were manifestly escapist in character. The provisions regarding free elections in Poland were at best a transparent fig leaf for outright Soviet domination, while the rhetoric concerning future peace simply obscured the emerging and very basic differences between the major powers. However, that rhetoric did serve to further delude Western public opinion regarding Russia's true intentions, thereby making it more difficult for the Western democracies to cope effectively with the emerging East-West confrontation.

By failing to construct an agreed-upon world, while in effect sanctioning the concessions made earlier at Teheran, Yalta became subsequently the symbol of Europe's partition. The follow-on meeting at Potsdam was merely a contentious session to carve the spoils. It was at Yalta that the Westerners belatedly had their first inklings that the concession of Eastern Europe to Soviet domination might be the beginning of the contest for central and Western Europe, while to Stalin Western reticence regarding satisfaction of the wider Soviet goals foreshadowed a more difficult political struggle than apparently anticipated earlier. Henceforth, the increasingly overt preoccupation of Soviet policy became one of driving the United States out of Eurasia.

That preoccupation has endured for the 40 subsequent years—and today it is still the central motif of Soviet foreign policy. Its concomitant is the determination to prevent the emergence of a genuine Europe motivated by shared political will. The last four decades, however, also reveal an important strategic lesson: what has done to be seen as the legacy of Yalta—namely the partitioned Europe—can only be undone either in Soviet favor through Litvinov's more subtle design of domination through acquienscence, or to Europe's historical advantage by the emergence of a truly European Europe capable both of attracting Eastern Europe and of diluting Soviet control over the region. America does not have the power or the will to change basically the situation in Eastern Europe, while crude and heavily-handed Soviet efforts to intimidate West Europe merely consolidate the Atlantic connection.

Of the two principal sides, it has been the Soviet that has sought much more persistently than the American to achieve a geopolitical breakthrough, settling the fate of Eurasia. Yalta had stimulated Soviet anxieties that America might not in fact disengage totally from Europe; Potsdam reinforced them, while the subsequent announcement of the Marshall Plan confirmed Moscow's worst fears: America, contrary to Stalin's hopes and expectations, was becoming implanted on the continent, de facto checking the expansion of Soviet power.

Subsequent history has been punctuated by more overt and direct Soviet efforts to challenge that reality head-on—above and beyond the relentless attempts to undermine it. The political campaign against the Marshall Plan, and Stalin's open decision to keep both Czechoslovakia and Poland out of it, were undertaken in the context of the strategic conclusion that not only would America remain engaged in European affairs but that a protracted political conflict was not inevitable. The subsequent Berlin crisis was thus an important test of will, designed to challenge America's suddenly improvised determination to play a major role in the truncated Germany.

It is important to be clear about it: neither Stalin's blockade of Berlin, nor Khrushchev's Berlin crisis of a decade later, was about Berlin itself. In both cases, the stake was the American security connection with Western Europe. This is why both Stalin and Khrushchev were willing to risk even a period of very high tension—dangerously high tension—with America, something which Berlin itself did not merit. Had the Soviets prevailed, Germany would have been panicked, and the vaunted American commitment to the defense of Europe would have been rendered impotent. The geopolitical effect of a Soviet success in Berlin would have been to establish Soviet paramountcy over Western Europe.

Though the two Berlin crises were the most overt indicators of the enduring Soviet determination to sever the Atlantic security connection, Soviet diplomacy throughout the postwar era has pursued also the cardinal objective of ensuring that a geopolitically vital Europe does not surface as a competitor or even as a neighbor. Soviet foreign policy—using all its diplomatic leverage as well as such overt and hidden tools as the West European Communist parties and the myriad of fellow travelers—has been active in opposing such schemes as the European Defense Community, and it has above all persistently tried to place obstacles in the way of the Common Market's evolution toward a political personality. Even if Western Europe cannot be severed from America, it must at least be kept divided and weak.

The commitment to the goal of expelling America from Europe is not just lingering in the Kremlin. It animates the current Soviet leadership, a leadership more Stalinist in substance than any since 1953. Attempting to exploit the West European "peace movements" and unease regarding the anti-Soviet rhetoric of the Reagan Administration, the current Soviet leadership decided to elevate the INF (intermediate-range nuclear forces) issue into a new test of will, again making the Atlantic security connection the ultimate stake. The Soviet decision to refuse to negotiate with the United States on arms control issues unless the United States dismantles and removes its Pershing IIs and ground-launched cruise missiles is tantamount to an attempt to impose on America a public humiliation with wide-ranging strategic consequences. It is the functional equivalent to the earlier Berlin crises.

But the Soviet leadership has again overreached itself. Its heavy-handed tactics contributed to the defeat of the neutralist Social Democratic Party in Germany, to the discrediting of the unilateral disarmers in the Labour Party in Britain, and to the strong show of solidarity with America displayed by Europe on this issue. (Parenthetically, one may add that almost simultaneously the present Soviet leadership has stimulated in Japan the highest degree of anti-Sovietism since World War II.) It did so because it overestimated the depth of the neutralist sentiments and the extent of the West European, even the German, stake in the East-West détente. It may also have overestimated the impact on West European public opinion of the greatly increased Soviet strategic power, especially in comparison to the Berlin crises of the late 1940s and the late 1950s. The Soviet leaders may have calculated that the combination of a specifically West European interest in détente with the growing fear of Soviet military power (especially with the massive deployment of the SS-20s targeted on Western Europe) might stampede the West Europeans—even if not the Americans—into a unilateral accommodation. They thus relied too much on simple political intimidation.

Nonetheless, in addition to noting Soviet persistence in seeking to achieve the subordination of Western Europe, it is important not to be overly reassured by the Soviet failure. For that failure is due more to the crudeness of the Soviet tactics than to the resilience of Western Europe. The fact is that Western Europe as such has not emerged politically. In that respect the Soviet Union can be said to have achieved at least a part of what it has been seeking since Yalta. In the meantime, the continued division of Europe breeds growing resentment not only of the direct Soviet domination over Eastern Europe but also of the American role in Europe, a situation which more skillfull Soviet diplomacy could at some point more intelligently exploit.

The political reality is that America cannot undo Europe's partition, but the existence of that partition intensifies the American-Soviet rivalry which in turn perpetuates the partition. Though America has at times sought to loosen the bonds that both tie and subordinate Eastern Europe to Moscow, at the truly critical junctures America has chosen not to contest Soviet domination directly. American policy has aimed at carefully encouraging the peaceful evolution of a somewhat more pluralistic Eastern Europe, a process that is bound to take time and which can periodically be reversed by force, as through martial law in Poland in 1981. However, when the East German regime collapsed in 1953, when Hungary arose in 1956, when Czechoslovakia peacefully emancipated itself in 1968 only to be invaded by Soviet armed forces, the United States adopted a passive posture masked by anti-Soviet rhetoric. Whether more could have been done is debatable, but that not much was done is undeniable.

VI

American prudence is one reason why the Europeans sense that America cannot undo the division of Europe. The other reason is even more basic. America cannot undo the partition of Europe without in effect defeating Russia. And that the Russians must and will resist firmly—just as the direct expulsion of America from Western Europe would be resisted by America as an intolerable defeat. At the same time, the partition of Germany in the context of the partition of Europe makes both partitions a live issue. It ensures a continuing political struggle for the future of Germany and thus for the future of Europe. It locks America and Russia into a strategically central conflict, but with the stakes so high that neither can countenance a direct defeat. With divided Germany thus serving as the permanent catalyst for change, the issue of the future of Europe remains a live issue, despite the stalemate of the last 40 years.

The situation might have been altogether different if the division of Europe had not entailed simultaneously the division of Germany. If instead of the Elbe the geopolitical American-Soviet frontier had been fixed on the Rhine or on the Oder-Neisse line, the division of Europe into two spheres of influence would have been neater and politically easier to maintain. With the Rhine as the dividing line, the West European rump would have felt so threatened by the Soviet presence, backed by a Sovietized Germany, that henceforth its enduring preoccupation would have been to insure the closest possible ties with America, forgetting altogether about the fate of the Soviet-dominated central and eastern Europe. If, on the other hand, Soviet sway had been extended only to the Oder-Neisse line, the Poles and the Czechs would have been so fearful that an American-backed Germany might resume its traditional Drang nach Osten that the partition of Europe would have been of very secondary concern.

As it happens, the existing stalemate is increasingly resented by all Europeans. The Germans—no longer dominated by feelings of war guilt, less mesmerized by the American ideal, distressed by the failure of Europe to become an alternative to divisive nationalisms—are naturally drawn to a growing preoccupation with the fate of their brethren living under an alien system. The notion that the destiny of a united Germany depends on a close relationship with Russia is not a new one in German political tradition. Frustration with the nation's division is giving it a new lease on life.

Moreover, for Germany especially but also for Western Europe as a whole, the East holds a special economic attraction. It has been the traditional market for West European industrial goods. As Western Europe discovers that in its fragmented condition it is becoming less competitive with the high-tech economies of America and Japan, the notion of a special economic relationship with the East becomes particularly appealing. The fear that America may be turning from the Atlantic to the Pacific has in this connection a self-fulfilling and a self-validating function: it justifies a wider economic, and potentially even a political, accommodation between an industrially obsolescent Western Europe and the even more backward Soviet bloc, a logical consumer for what Western Europe can produce.

More than most Europeans, the East Europeans, no longer expecting American liberation, long for a genuine Europe, which would free them from the Soviet yoke. That longing explains the extraordinary standing to this day in Eastern Europe of de Gaulle—simply because he raised the standard of "Europe to the Urals." It explains also the special appeal of the Pope, whose vision of Europe's spiritual unity has obvious political implications. But the East Europeans will settle for half a loaf if they cannot have the whole. Faced with the choice of exclusive Soviet domination, only occasionally contested by American policy, or of at least growing ties with even a politically weak Western Europe, the East Europeans clearly prefer the latter.

To register all of this is not to say that Europe will simply drift into a separate accommodation with the Soviet Union, fu the continued absence of a united Europe, the mounting American frustration with the low level of the European defense effort, and the inevitable appeal of escapist notions regarding disarmament, nuclear freezes, and the like could have a significant impact on both American and European public opinion. Indeed, under certain circumstances, one can even envisage a spontaneous American inclination to disengage from Europe, with conservatives advocating it out of irritation with European unwillingness to do more for common defense, and with liberals propounding it because of their current tendency to deal with difficult security matters by evasion. The U.S. deficit will, in any case, drive Congress toward a more critical look at the cost of the U.S. NATO commitment.

In Europe itself, such a more subtle Litvinov-type Soviet policy would aim not at the dismantling of NATO as such but at depriving it of any political or military substance. Exploiting the duality of German feelings and the growing ties between Bonn and East Berlin, it would seek to transform Germany into a quasi-neutral member of NATO, thereby alarming and further fragmenting Western Europe. Instead of concentrating on trying to inflict on America a visible and direct political defeat in Europe, it would play on European unwillingness to associate itself with America in the wider global and ideological rivalry with Russia, in order to achieve European acquiescence to a subordinate relationship with Moscow.

It is not self-fulfilling pessimism to note that a Europe dependent militarily, fragmented politically, and anachronistic economically remains a Europe more vulnerable to such blandishments. In brief, a sustained Soviet peace offensive poses the greater danger that Moscow finally might succeed in splitting Europe from America and thus, taking advantage of Europe's continued historical fatigue, attain finally a Yaltanized Europe.

VII

As President Mitterrand put it some two years ago, "tout ce qui permettera de sortir de Yalta sera bon. . . ." But how to escape from Yalta? Forty years later, there must be a better option for both Europe and America than either a partitioned and prostrated Europe that perpetuates the American-Soviet collision, or a disunited Europe divorced from America acquiescing piecemeal to Soviet domination over Eurasia. And there is such a third option: the emergence of a politically more vital Europe less dependent militarily on the United States, encouraged in that direction by an America guided by a timely historic vision, and leading eventually to a fundamentally altered relationship with Eastern Europe and with Russia.

This third option requires a long-term strategy of the kind that the West simply has not devised in dealing with the enduring post-Yalta European dilemma. The point of departure for such a long-term strategy has to be joint recognition of the important conclusion which the experience of the last several decades teaches. The historic balance in Europe will be changed gradually in the West's favor only if Russia comes to be faced west of the Elbe rather less by America and rather more by Europe.

Thoughtful Europeans realize, moreover, that the future of Europe is intertwined with the future of Germany and of Poland. Without spanning, in some non-threatening fashion, the division of Germany, there will not be a genuine Europe; but continuing Russian domination of Poland makes Russian control over East Germany geopolitically possible. Thus the relationship between Russia on the one hand and Germany and Poland on the other must be peacefully transformed if a larger Europe is ever to emerge.

Both Americans and Europeans must also face up to the implications of the fact that the division of Europe is not only the unnatural consequence of the destruction of Europe in the course of two world wars; in the long run it is also an inherently unstable and potentially dangerous situation. It is likely to produce new explosions in Easter Europe and it could also generate a basic and destabilizing reorientation in Western Europe, especially since for many Europeans the existence of the two alliances across the dividing line in the middle of Europe is seen as an extension of superpower efforts to perpetuate the status quo.

Accordingly, concentration on the purely military dimension of the East-West problem, or trying to get the West Europeans to hew to the U.S. line in the Middle East or in Central America, is not going to preserve Western unity. America has to identify itself with a cause which has deeply felt emotional significance to most Europeans. Undoing the division of Europe, which is so essential to its spiritual and moral recovery, is a goal worthy of the Western democracies and one capable of galvanizing a shared sense of historic purpose.

But that objective, so essential to Europe's restoration, cannot be accomplished as an American victory over Russia. Nor will it be achieved by an explicit Russian acceptance, through a negotiated agreement, of Eastern Europe's emancipation from Russian vassalage. Moscow will not yield voluntarily. A wider Europe can only emerge as a consequence of a deliberately but subtly induced process of change, by historical stealth so to speak, which can neither be quickly detected nor easily resisted.

The West must shape that process and give it historical direction. As the point of departure for seeking the common goal, one can envisage a strategy combining five broad political, economic and military dimensions. Some involve relatively simple acts and can be summarized succinctly; some require more complicated processes of change, are bound to be more controversial, and thus require a fuller justification.

First, on the symbolic plane, it would be appropriate for the heads of the democratic West as a whole, perhaps on February 4, 1985, to clarify jointly, through a solemn declaration, the West's attitude toward the historic legacy of Yalta. In publicly repudiating that bequest—the partition of Europe—the West should underline its commitment to a restored Europe, free of extra-European control. It should stress in its belief that there now exists a genuine European political identity, the heir to Europe's civilization, which is entitled to unfettered expression. It should affirm the right of every European nation to choose its sociopolitical system in keeping with its history and tradition. It should explicitly reject and condemn Moscow's imposition on so many Europeans of a system that is culturally and politically so alien to them. Finally, by drawing attention to the positive experience of neutral Austria and Finland, it should pledge that a more authentic Europe would not entail the extension of the American sphere of influence to the European state frontiers of the Soviet Union.

Second, and in direct connection with the renunciation of Yalta's burden, the West should simultaneously reconfirm its commitment to the Helsinki Final Act. This is absolutely essential, for otherwise the repudiation of Yalta could give the Soviets the convenient argument that the territorial integrity of Poland and of Czechoslovakia is thereby again endangered. The Helsinki agreements confirmed the durability of the existing frontiers in central and eastern Europe, and the eastern nations must be reassured on this score. At the same time, the Helsinki agreements legalized and institutionalized the notion that the West has a right to comment on the internal practices of East European governments and that respect of human rights is a general international obligation. Accordingly, the repudiation of Yalta's historic legacy should be accompanied by the reaffirmation of the West's commitment to peaceful East-West relations, to the maintenance of the existing territorial status quo, and to the indivisibility of the concepts of freedom and human rights.

Moreover, reaffirmation of the continued Western commitment to the Helsinki Final Act could help to resolve the potentially fatal European ambivalence regarding Germany. The fact is that, while the Europeans resent their historic partition, they fear almost as much a reunited Germany. Therefore, the renunciation of Yalta's legacy—the division of Europe—should be accompanied by an explicit pledge, through the reaffirmation of Helsinki's continued relevance, that the purpose of healing the East-West rift in Europe is not to dismantle any existing state but to give every European people the opportunity to participate fully in wider all-European cooperation. In that context, the division of Germany need not be undone through formal reunification but by the gradual emergence of a much less threatening loose confederation of the existing two states.

Third, much in keeping with the spirit of these symbolic acts, Western Europe should strive to create the maximum number of opportunities for East European participation in various all-European bodies. There is today a proliferation of such institutions, both private and public. East Europeans should be encouraged quietly but systemically to increase their participation—even if initially only as observers—in such bodies as the European Parliament, as well as the myriad of more specialized technical agencies. The fostering in Eastern Europe of the European spirit, and of greater East European recognition that there is more to Europe today than meets the eye, is clearly in the interest of all Europe. But a new burst of energy in this regard is much needed.

It would also be appropriate for the major West European nations, as well as for America, to sponsor during the Yalta year of 1985—on either a private or public basis—a series of seminars and conferences on the future of post-Yalta Europe. A special effort should be made to invite East Europeans to participate, on whatever basis is possible, in deliberations designed to forge during that year a wider consensus on how bet to undo peacefully Yalta's legacy.

In addition, Western Europe should reactivate efforts previously initiated but lately dormant designed to encourage closer contacts and eventually even some form of collaboration between the Common Market and Eastern Europe. In different ways, both East Germany and Yugoslavia today have practical relationships with that important West European entity. Precisely because the present Soviet leadership has stepped up its efforts to integrate Eastern Europe into COMECON and thus to bind it to the Soviet economy, additional initiative on the part of the Common Market is now badly needed. Even if the East Europeans, under Soviet pressure, were to rebuff such Western efforts at closer contacts, exchange of information and some cooperative projects, the Western initiative would still have a positive effect. The recent East German willingness to risk Soviet displeasure at growing inter-German ties reflects the widespread desire as well as economic need of Eastern Europe for closer links with the rest of Europe. The continued economic stagnation of the Soviet-type economies makes the timing for greater Western activism in this regard particularly propitious.

Fourth, and in no way in conflict with the preceding, Europe should intensify its aid to those East Europeans who are struggling actively for the political emancipation of Eastern Europe. That struggle is the necessary concomitant and at least partially also the cause of evolutionary change in Eastern Europe. Only too often do West European well-wishers of a more independent Eastern Europe look askance at those in the East who undertake more direct forms of struggle. While cultivation of Eastern European officials enjoys a certain fashionable prestige in Western circles, tangible assistance to those resisting totalitarianism is viewed only too frequently as somehow "in the spirit of the cold war."

Yet a division of labor between America and Europe in which the former is seen as alone in supporting dissident "subversion" while the latter engages exclusively in offical courtship would be self-defeating. West Europeans should undertake to provide support for some of the activities that America has quite generously, for Europe's sake as well as for its own, sustained for more than three decades. The French recently have done so for the Polish Solidarity movement, and so have some other Europeans. Radio Paris has been gaining more East European listeners. But much more needs to be done. Germany, for example, after Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in effect endorsed Wojciech Jaruzelski's martial law in Poland, confined itself to truly humanitarian private philanthropy; it has not been as active as it could be in sustaining various forms of East European political activity designed to induce the existing regimes to transform themselves.

In subtle but sustained fashion West Europe could aid the East Europeans in such efforts, because in the age of transistors and mass communications totalitarian control can be pierced, with positive political effect. Western Europe should, after all, be a direct partner in the struggle for Europe's future, and a well-funded Franco-British-German-Italian consortium (a Foundation for a Post-Yalta Europe) to aid East European efforts to emancipate peacefully the eastern portion of Europe would be an appropriate and long overdue contribution.

Fifth, the time has come for a more fundamental rethinking of the relationship between Western security and political change in Europe as a whole. The West can make the needed adjustment, and America—since it plays the central military role—should take the lead to that end. America is needed in Europe to deter Russia not only from military aggression but from political intimidation. That is obvious and it justifies NATO and the American military presence on the continent. But an American military presence that reduces the incentive for the Europeans to unite politically, yet simultaneously increases the incentive for the Soviets to stay put militarily in central and eastern Europe, is a military presence not guided by a subtle political-historical calculus. A more sensitive calibration of the political-military equation is needed in order to safeguard Western Europe while promoting change in the East-West relationship.

If Europe is to emerge politically, it must assume a more direct role in its own defense. A Europe that plays a larger defense role will require a lesser, or at least a redefined, American military presence. A Europe that can defend itself more on its own is a Europe that is also politically more vital, while less challenging to the Soviet Union from a purely military point of view, than a Europe with a large American military presence in its very center. Such a Europe would then be better able to satisfy the East European yearning for closer association without such association being tantamount to an American defeat of Russia.

But Europe must be prodded to move in that direction. Left as it is, Europe's cultural hedonism and political complacence will ensure that not much is done. Even the modest 1978 NATO commitment to a three percent per annum increase in defense expenditures was not honored by most European states. America should, therefore, initiate a longer-term process to alter the nature of its military presence in Europe gradually, while making it clear to the Europeans that the change is not an act of anger or a threat (à la the Mansfield resolution) but rather the product of a deliberate strategy designed to promote Europe's unity and its historic restoration.

Ultimately, the United States in NATO should be responsible primarily for offsetting Soviet strategic power, thus deterring both a Soviet attack or nuclear blackmail. But on the ground, the defense of Europe over the next decade should become an even more predominantly European responsibility. The needed process of replacing gradually but not totally (and certainly not in Berlin) the U.S. ground combat forces could perhaps be accelerated if, through the Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions talks or otherwise, the Soviet Union were willing to reciprocate by comparable withdrawals of its own ground forces. But, in any case, it should be accompanied by appropriate European efforts to assume greater responsibility for the defense of Europe not only on a purely national basis but through enhanced European defense coordination.

The United States should particularly encourage efforts at increased Franco-German military cooperation and eventual integration. France has a historic awareness of a European identity while Germany chafes under Europe's partition. A Franco-Germany army would have the manpower, the resources, and the fighting potential to pick up the slack created by a gradual decrease in the American combat presence on the ground. The eventual fusion of these two national forces into a joint combat force would represent a giant step toward a politically more vital Europe, yet a Europe which would be less conflictual with the Soviet Union than a Europe hosting a large U.S. army and less threatening to Eastern Europe than a Europe with a powerful separate German army. A gradually reduced U.S. ground presence would in turn create pressure from even the existing East European regimes for a commensurate Soviet redeployment, thereby gradually creating a more flexible political situation.

To move Europe in this direction, the United States will have to take the first steps, even perhaps unilaterally through a ten-year program of annual cuts in the level of the U.S. ground forces in Europe. But these steps should be taken in the context of an articulated strategy that has a constructive political as well as military rationale. Its political purpose should be openly proclaimed: to create the setting for Europe's restoration and, through it, also for a more stable East-West relationship. It would also have to be made clear that some American combat forces would remain in Europe, as they do in Korea, thereby ensuring immediate American engagement in the event of hostilities. Moreover, continued American strategic protection of Europe should not remain confined only to the possible employment of nuclear weaponry. It should over time, with technological advance, be enhanced to include also some strategic defense. As strategic defense for America becomes more viable, it should be a major American goal to extend some of its protection to Europe as well.

A division of labor in NATO along the foregoing lines would make it much easier to consider by Yalta's fiftieth anniversary also those East-West security and political arrangements which at the moment seem premature, unrealistic, or excessively threatening to America or to Russia. These could include demilitarized or nuclear-free zones or extension of the Austrian-type neutrality to other areas, including later even to a loosely confederated Germany. It would encourage a process of change permitting the latent or frustrated West and East European impulses for the restoration of Europe gradually to surface. Eventually, it would permit Europe to emerge, and to play a major role on the Eurasian continent, along with the Soviet Union, India and China, while helping to ensure through its links with America that no single power dominates that geopolitically vital continent.

VIII

The fiftieth anniversary of Yalta is only ten years away. It should be our shared goal to fashion by then political-military arrangements which, instead of perpetuating the division of Europe—and perhaps even prompting West Europe's political decay, create the preconditions for peacefully undoing Yalta. A Western Europe essentially self-reliant in regional defense, while covered by the U.S. system of nuclear deterrence and also eventually by U.S. strategic defense, would be a Western Europe more capable of pursuing a positive policy toward the East without fear of domination by Moscow. In the final analysis, only Europeans can restore Europe; it cannot be done for them by others.

To be sure, Moscow will resist the aspirations of the Europeans. No empire dissolves itself voluntarily—at least not until it becomes evident that accommodation to gradual dissolution is preferable to the rising costs of preserving the imperial system. So it will be also with the Soviet empire. Moscow will violently protest any Western disavowal of Yalta's legacy and will accuse the West of worsening East-West relations; that is only to be expected. But such public disavowal is the necessary point of departure for more focused efforts by all the Europeans gradually to undo their continent's division. Once that historic commitment has been made, these efforts, as recommended here, need not be either aggressive or initially even very explicit. As time passes, with the organic growth of a larger Europe gathering momentum, it will become more and more difficult for the Kremlin to resist a process that over time may acquire the hallmarks of historical inevitability. At some point, then, even the Soviets may find it useful to codify some new neutrality arrangements in central Europe and to reduce and eventually to remove their occupation forces.

One should not underestimate in this connection Moscow's adaptability. Despite his ruthlessness, even Stalin accommodated himself to the reality of an indpendent Catholic Church in Poland; Khrushchev to a Polish peasantry free from collectivization and to a separate Romanian foreign policy; Brezhnev to "goulash communism" in Hungary and to army rule in Poland. Why then should not the next generation of Soviet leaders be pressed also to come to terms with the fact that even the interests of the Soviet people would be better served by a less frustrated and oppressed east-central Europe, partaking more directly of the benefits of all-European cooperation?

As divided Europe enters the fifth decade after Yalta, it is important to reiterate that undoing Yalta cannot involve a precise blueprint or a single dramatic initiative. The shape of the future cannot be reduced to a neat plan, with specific phases and detailed agreements. Rather, it requires an explicit commitment and a sense of strategic direction for a process of change that is bound to have also its own dynamic. In any case, for America the emergence of a more vital Europe would be a positive outcome, for ultimately a pluralistic world is in America's true interest. Moreover, such a development would avert the major danger that if Yalta's legacy is not deliberately—though peacefully—undone in the East, it will eventually become the reality in the West. In other words, Yalta must be consigned to Europe's past if it is not to become Europe's future.

UNITED STATES-JAPAN TRADE

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, Senator BOREN and I announced on Friday our intention to offer a resolution that would link an opening of Japan's markets to extension of the limits on Japanese auto imports.

Obviously, we view the $123 billion trade deficit as a matter of the utmost gravity. The largest single contributor to this horrifying deficit is Japan, with which nation we posted a stunning deficit of $37 billion in 1984.

We believe that Japan must increase its purchases of American goods and services if it expects an end to the limits on its auto shipments to the United States. It is time that Japan's litany of empty promises give way to results. It is time for Japan to do what it says it intends to do: open its markets, and now.

I rise to advise the Senate that the following Senators will cosponsor our resolution when it is formally introduced:

Senators ABDNOR, ANDREWS, BAUCUS, BINGAMAN, BURDICK, DIXON, DODD, EAGLETON, FORD, GARN, HEFLIN, HEINZ, KENNEDY, LAUTENBERG, LEVIN, MITCHELL, PRESSLER, PROXMIRE, QUAYLE, RIEGLE, SIMON, SPECTER, and WARNER.

Several Senators have indicated a desire to prepare floor statements for the formal introduction of this resolution. Moreover, we expect that several additional cosponsors will join between now and the date of introduction.

I would take this opportunity to advise the Senate of the text of our resolution. I ask that the text be included at the end of my statement.

Let me say, Mr. President, that Senator BOREN and I are greatly encouraged by the initial response to our Dear Colleague letter, which was distributed on Tuesday.

The strong support which we are receiving suggests to me that we will be in a position to secure a rollcall vote in the Senate at an early date.

Clearly, Senator BOREN and I believe the time is right for Congress to send a clear, strong signal to Japan, and to the administration, that our bilateral trade deficit with Japan has to come down, and quickly.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DANFORTH-BOREN RESOLUTION ON UNITED STATES-JAPAN TRADE

Whereas, the United States merchandise trade deficit with Japan reached the unprecedented level of $37 billion in 1984—accounting for almost one-third of the entire United States deficit with the world;

Whereas, this unprecedented bilateral deficit was accumulated in spite of significant growth in the Japanese economy;

Whereas, the principles of free trade provide for trade flows between nations on the basis of each nation's comparative advantage;

Whereas, Japan has extensive access to the United States market for products where Japan has comparative advantage;

Whereas, United States exporters lack access to the Japanese market for manufactured goods, forest products, key agricultural commodities and certain services where the United States has comparative advantage;

Whereas, the high value of the dollar relative to the yen effectively subsidizes Japanese exports to the United States and taxes United States exports to Japan;

Whereas, despite the voluntary restraint, Japanese autos continue to account for approximately 2 million cars imported into the United States market—contributing over $20 billion to the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas, years of negotiating with Japan to secure meaningful improvements in market access for competitive United States exports have been largely unsuccessful;

Whereas, many other countries experience comparable difficulty in obtaining access to the Japanese market;

Whereas, an end to the voluntary restraint on autos without a comparable improvement in access for competitive United States exports to the Japanese market will severely exacerbate the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas, this deficit has the potential of undermining the entire range of bilateral relations between the United States and Japan;

Therefore, be it resolved that the voluntary restraint on Japanese autos not be ended until United States exports to Japan are substantially increased and the United States trade deficit with Japan is substantially reduced.

STATE OF THE UNION ADDRESS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 17

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table:

To the Congress of the United States:

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and fellow citizens. I come before you to report on the state of our Union. And I am pleased to report that, after 4 years of united effort, the American people have brought forth a Nation renewed—stronger, freer, and more secure than before.

Four years ago, we began to change—forever, I hope—our assumptions about Government and its place in our lives. Out of that change has come great and robust growth—in our confidence, our economy, and our role in the world.

Tonight, America is stronger because of the values we hold dear. We believe faith and freedom must be our guiding stars, for they show us truth, make us brave, give us hope, and leave us wiser than we were. Our progress began not in Washington, D.C., but in the hearts of our families, communities, workplaces, and voluntary groups which, together, are unleashing the invincible spirit of one great Nation under God.

Four years ago, we said we would invigorate our economy by giving people greater freedom and incentives to take risks, and letting them keep more of what they earned.

We did what we promised, and a great industrial giant is reborn. Tonight we can take pride in 25 straight months of economic growth, the strongest in 34 years; a 3-year inflation average of 3.9 percent, the lowest in 17 years; and 7.3 million new jobs in 2 years, with more of our citizens working than ever before.

New freedom in our lives has planted the rich seeds for future success:

For an America of wisdom that honors the family, knowing that as the family goes, so goes our civilization;

For an America of vision that sees tomorrow's dreams in the learning and hard work we do today;

For an America of courage whose servicemen and women, even as we meet, proudly stand watch on the frontiers of freedom;

For an America of compassion that opens its heart to those who cry out for help.

We have begun well. But it's only a beginning. We are not here to congratulate ourselves on what we have done, but to challenge ourselves to finish what has not yet been done.

We are here to speak for millions in our inner cities who long for real jobs, safe neighborhoods, and schools that truly teach. We are here to speak for the American farmer, the entrepreneur, and every worker in industries fighting to modernize and compete. And, yes, we are here to stand, and proudly so, for all who struggle to break free from totalitarianism; for all who know in their hearts that freedom is the one true path to peace and human happiness.

Proverbs tells us, without a vision the people perish. When asked what great principle holds our Union together, Abraham Lincoln said, "Something in [the] Declaration giving liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but hope to the world for all future time."

We honor the giants of our history not by going back, but forward to the dreams their vision foresaw. My fellow citizens, this Nation is poised for greatness. The time has come to proceed toward a great new challenge—a Second American Revolution of hope and opportunity; a revolution carrying us to new heights of progress by pushing back frontiers of knowledge and space; a revolution of spirit that taps the soul of America, enabling us to summon greater strength than we have ever known; and, a revolution that carries beyond our shores the golden promise of human freedom in a world at peace.

Let us begin by challenging conventional wisdom: There are no constraints on the human mind, no walls around the human spirit, no barriers to our progress except those we ourselves erect. Already, pushing down tax rates has freed our economy to vault forward to record growth.

In Europe, they call it "the American Miracle." Day by day, we are shattering accepted notions of what is possible. When I was growing up, we failed to see how a new thing called radio would transform our marketplace. Well, today many have not yet seen how advances in technology are transforming our lives.

In the late 1950's, workers at the AT&T semiconductor plant in Pennsylvania produced five transistors a day for $7.50 apiece. They now produce over a million for less than a penny apiece.

New laser techniques could revolutionize heart bypass surgery, cut diagnosis time for viruses linked to cancer from weeks to minutes, reduce hospital costs dramatically, and hold out new promise for saving human lives.

Our automobile industry has overhauled assembly lines, increased worker productivity, and is competitive once again.

We stand on the threshold of a great ability to produce more, do more, be more. Our economy is not getting older and weaker, it's getting younger and stronger; it doesn't need rest and supervision, it needs new challenge and greater freedom. And that word—freedom—is the key to the Second American Revolution we mean to bring about.

Let us move together with an historic reform of tax simplification for fairness and growth. Last year, I asked Treasury Secretary Regan to develop a plan to simplify the tax code, so all taxpayers would be treated more fairly, and personal tax rates could come further down.

We have cut tax rates by almost 25 percent, yet the tax system remains unfair and limits our potential for growth. Exclusions and exemptions cause similar incomes to be taxed at different levels. Low-income families face steep tax barriers that make hard lives even harder. The Treasury Department has produced an excellent reform plan whose principles will guide the final proposal we will ask you to enact.

One thing that tax reform will not be is a tax increase in disguise. We will not jeopardize the mortgage interest deduction families need. We will reduce personal tax rates as low as possible by removing many tax preferences. We will propose a top rate of no more than 35 percent, and possibly lower. And we will propose reducing corporate rates while maintaining incentives for capital formation.

To encourage opportunity and jobs rather than dependency and welfare, we will propose that individuals living at or near the poverty line be totally exempt from Federal income tax. To restore fairness to families, we will propose increasing significantly the personal exemption.

Tonight, I am instructing Treasury Secretary James Baker to begin working with congressional authors and committees for bipartisan legislation conforming to these principles. We will call upon the American people for support, and upon every man and woman in this chamber. Together, we can pass, this year, a tax bill for fairness, simplicity, and growth making this economy the engine of our dreams, and America the investment capital of the world—so let us begin.

Tax simplification will be a giant step toward unleashing the tremendous pent-up power of our economy. But a Second American Revolution must carry the promise of opportunity for all. It is time to liberate the spirit of enterprise in the most distressed areas of our country.

This Government will meet its responsibility to help those in need. But policies that increase dependency, break up families, and destroy self-respect are not progressive, they are reactionary. Despite our strides in civil rights, blacks, hispanics, and all minorities will not have full and equal power until they have full economic power.

We have repeatedly sought passage of enterprise zones to help those in the abandoned corners of our land find jobs, learn skills, and build better lives. This legislation is supported by a majority of you. Mr. Speaker, I know we agree: There must be no forgotten Americans. Let us place new dreams in a million hearts and create a new generation of entrepreneurs by passing enterprise zones this year.

Nor must we lose the chance to pass our Youth Employment Opportunity Wage proposal. We can help teenagers who have the highest unemployment rate find summer jobs, so they can know the pride of work, and have confidence in their futures.

We will continue to support the Job Training Partnership Act, which has a nearly two-thirds job placement rate. Passage of tuition tax credits and education and health care vouchers will help working families shop for services they need.

Our Administration is already encouraging certain low-income public housing residents to own and manage their own dwellings. It is time all public housing residents have that opportunity of ownership.

The Federal Government can help create a new atmosphere of freedom. But States and localities, many of which enjoy surpluses from the recovery, must not permit their tax and regulatory policies to stand as barriers to growth.

Let us resolve that we will stop spreading dependency and start spreading opportunity; that we will stop spreading bondage and start spreading freedom.

There are some who say growth initiatives must await final action on deficit reductions. Well, the best way to reduce deficits is through economic growth. More businesses will be started, more investments made, more jobs created, and more people will be on payrolls paying taxes. The best way to reduce Government spending is to reduce the need for spending by increasing prosperity. Each added percentage point per year of real G.N.P. growth will lead to a cumulative reduction in deficits of nearly $200 billion over 5 years.

To move steadily toward a balanced budget we must also lighten Government's claim on our total economy. We will not do this by raising taxes. We must make sure that our economy grows faster than growth in spending by the Federal Government. In our Fiscal Year 1986 budget, overall Government program spending will be frozen at the current level; it must not be one dime higher than Fiscal Year 1985. Three points are key:

First, the social safety net for the elderly, needy, disabled, and unemployed will be left intact. Growth of our major health care programs, Medicare and Medicaid, will be slowed, but protections for the elderly and needy will be preserved.

Second, we must not relax our efforts to restore military strength just as we near our goal of a fully equipped, trained, and ready professional corps. National security is Government's first responsibility, so, in past years, defense spending took about half the Federal budget. Today it takes less than a third.

We have already reduced our planned defense expenditures by nearly $100 billion over the past 4 years, and reduced projected spending again this year. You know, we only have a military industrial complex until a time of danger. Then it becomes the arsenal of democracy. Spending for defense is investing in things that are priceless: peace and freedom.

Third, we must reduce or eliminate costly Government subsidies. For example, deregulation of the airline industry has led to cheaper airfares, but on Amtrak taxpayers pay about $35 per passenger every time an Amtrak train leaves the station. It's time we ended this huge Federal subsidy.

Our farm program costs have quadrupled in recent years. Yet I know from visiting farmers, many in great financial distress, that we need an orderly transition to a market-oriented farm economy. We can help farmers best, not by expanding Federal payments, but by making fundamental reforms, keeping interest rates heading down, and knocking down foreign trade barriers to American farm exports.

We are moving ahead with Grace Commission reforms to eliminate waste, and improve Government's management practices. In the long run, we must protect the taxpayers from Government. I ask again that you pass, as 32 States have now called for, an amendment mandating the Federal Government spend no more than it takes in. And I ask for the authority used responsibly by 43 Governors to veto individual items in appropriations bills. Senator MATTINGLY has introduced a bill permitting a 2-year trial run of the line-item veto. I hope you will pass and send that legislation to my desk.

Nearly 50 years of Government living beyond its means has brought us to a time of reckoning. Ours is but a moment in history. But one moment of courage, idealism, and bipartisan unity can change American history forever.

Sound monetary policy is key to long-running economic strength and stability. We will continue to cooperate with the Federal Reserve Board, seeking a steady policy that ensures price stability, without keeping interest rates artificially high or needlessly holding down growth.

Reducing unneeded red tape and regulations, and deregulating the energy, transportation, and financial industries, have unleashed new competition, giving consumers more choices, better services, and lower prices. In just one set of grant programs we have reduced 905 pages of regulations to 31.

We seek to fully deregulate natural gas to bring on new supplies and bring us closer to energy independence. Consistant with safety standards, we will continue removing restraints on the bus and railroad industries; we will soon send up legislation to return Conrail to the private sector, where it belongs; and we will support further deregulation of the trucking industry.

Every dollar the Federal Government does not take from us, every decision it does not make for us, will make our economy stronger, our lives more abundant, our future more free.

Our Second American Revolution will push on to new possibilities not only on Earth—but in the next frontier of space. Despite budget restraints, we will seek record funding for research and development.

We have seen the success of the space shuttle. Now we are going to develop a permanently-manned Space Station, and new opportunities for free enterprise. In the next decade, Americans and our friends around the world will be living and working together in space.

In the zero-gravity of space we could manufacture in 30 days lifesaving medicines it would take 30 years to make on Earth. We can make crystals of exceptional purity to produce super computers, creating jobs, technologies, and medical breakthroughs beyond anything we ever dreamed possible.

As we do all this, we will continue to protect our natural resources. We will seek reauthorization and expanded funding for the Superfund program, to continue cleaning up hazardous waste sites which threaten human health and the environment.

There is another great heritage to speak of this evening. Of all the changes that have swept America the past 4 years, none brings greater promise than our rediscovery of the values of faith, freedom, family, work, and neighborhood.

We see signs of renewal in increased attendance in places of worship; renewed optimism and faith in our future; love of country rediscovered by our young who are leading the way. We have rediscovered that work is good in and of itself; that it enables us to create and contribute no matter how seemingly humble our jobs. We have seen a powerful new current from an old and honorable tradition—American generosity.

From thousands answering Peace Corps appeals to help boost food production in Africa, to millions volunteering time, corporations adopting schools, and communities pulling together to help the neediest among us at home, we have refound our values—we have refound America. Private sector initiatives are crucial to our future.

I thank the Congress for passing equal access legislation giving religious groups the same right to use classrooms after school that other groups enjoy. But no citizen need tremble, nor the world shudder, if a child stands in a classroom and breathes a prayer. We ask you again—give children back a right they had for a century-and-a-half or more.

The question of abortion grips our Nation. Abortion is either the taking of human life, or it isn't; and if it is—and medical technology is increasingly showing it is—it must be stopped.

It is a terrible irony that while some turn to abortion, so many others who cannot become parents cry out for children to adopt. We have room for these children; we can fill the cradles of those who want a child to love. Tonight I ask the Congress to move this year on legislation to protect the unborn.

In the area of education, we're returning to excellence, and again, the heroes are our people, not Government. We're stressing basics of discipline, rigorous testing, and homework, while helping children become computer-smart as well. For 20 years, Scholastic Aptitude Test scores of our high school students went down. But now they have gone up 2 of the last 3 years.

We must go forward in our commitment to the new basics, giving parents greater authority and making sure good teachers are rewarded for hard work and achievement through merit pay.

Of all the changes in the past 20 years, none has more threatened our sense of national well-being than the explosion of violent crime. One does not have to have been attacked to be a victim. The woman who must run to her car after shopping at night is a victim; the couple draping their door with locks and chains are victims; as is the tired, decent cleaning woman who can't ride a subway home without being afraid.

We do not seek to violate rights of defendants. But shouldn't we feel more compassion for victims of crime than for those who commit crime? For the first time in 20 years, the crime index has fallen 2 years in a row; we've convicted over 7,400 drug offenders, and put them, as well as leaders of organized crime, behind bars in record numbers.

But we must do more. I urge the House to follow the Senate and enact proposals permitting use of all reliable evidence that police officers acquire in good faith. These proposals would also reform the habeus corpus laws and allow, in keeping with the will of the overwhelming majority of Americans, the use of the death penalty where necessary.

There can be no economic revival in ghettos when the most violent among us are allowed to roam free. It is time we restored domestic tranquility. And we mean to do just that.

Just as we are positioned as never before to secure justice in our economy, we are poised as never before to create a safer, freer, more peaceful world.

Our alliances are stronger than ever. Our economy is stronger than ever. We have resumed our historic role as a leader of the free world—and all of these together are a great force for peace.

Since 1981, we have been committed to seeking fair and verifiable arms agreements that would lower the risk of war and reduce the size of nuclear arsenals. Now our determination to maintain a strong defense has influenced the Soviet Union to return to the bargaining table. Our negotiators must be able to go to that table with the united support of the American people. All of us have no greater dream than to see the day when nuclear weapons are banned from this Earth forever.

Each Member of the Congress has a role to play in modernizing our defenses, thus supporting our chances for a meaningful arms agreement. Your vote this spring on the Peacekeeper missile will be a critical test of our resolve to maintain the strength we need and move toward mutual and verifiable arms reductions.

For the past 20 years we have believed that no war will be launched as long as each side knows it can retaliate with a deadly counter-strike. Well, I believe there is a better way of eliminating the threat of nuclear war.

It is a Strategic Defense Initiative aimed at finding a non-nuclear defense against ballistic missiles. It is the most hopeful possibility of the nuclear age. But it is not well understood.

Some say it will bring war to the heavens—but its purpose is to deter war, in the heavens and on Earth. Some say the research would be expensive. Perhaps, but it could save millions of lives, indeed humanity itself. Some say if we build such a system, the Soviets will build a defense system of their own. Well, they already have strategic defenses that surpass ours; a civil defense system, where we have almost none; and a research program covering roughly the same areas of technology we're exploring. And finally, some say the research will take a long time. The answer to that is: "Let's get started."

Harry Truman once said that, ultimately, our security, and the world's hopes for peace and human progress, "lie not in measures of defense or in the control of weapons, but in the growth and expansion of freedom and self-government."

Tonight, we declare anew to our fellow citizens of the world: Freedom is not the sole prerogative of a chosen few; it is the universal right of all God's children. Look to where peace and prosperity flourish today. It is in homes that freedom built. Victories against poverty are greatest and peace most secure where people live by laws that ensure free press, free speech, and freedom to worship, vote, and create wealth.

Our mission is to nourish and defend freedom and democracy, and to communicate these ideals everywhere we can.

America's economic success is freedom's success; it can be repeated a hundred times in a hundred different nations. Many countries in East Asia and the Pacific have few resources other than the enterprise of their own people. But through low tax rates and free markets, they have soared ahead of centralized economies. And now China is opening up its economy to meet its needs.

We need a stronger and simpler approach to the process of making and implementing trade policy and will be studying potential changes in that process in the next few weeks.

We have seen the benefits of free trade and lived through the disasters of protectionism. Tonight, I ask all our trading partners, developed and developing alike, to join us in a new round of trade negotiations to expand trade and competition, and strengthen the global economy—and to begin it in the next year.

There are more than 3 billion human beings living in Third World countries, with an average per capita income of $650 a year. Many are victims of dictatorships that impoverish them with taxation and corruption. Let us ask our allies to join us in a practical program of trade and assistance that fosters economic development through personal incentives to help these people climb from poverty on their own.

We cannot play innocents abroad in a world that is not innocent. Nor can we be passive when freedom is under siege. Without resources, diplomacy cannot succeed; our security assistance programs help friendly governments defend themselves, and give them confidence to work for peace. Congress should understand that dollar for dollar security assistance contributes as much to global security as our own defense budget.

We must stand by all our democratic allies. And we must not break faith with those who are risking their lives—on every continent, from Afghanistan to Nicaragua—to defy Soviet-supported aggression and secure rights which have been ours from birth.

The Sandinista dictatorship of Nicaragua, with full Cuban Soviet-bloc support, not only persecutes its people, the church, and denies a free press, but arms and provides bases for communist terrorists attacking neighboring states. Support for freedom fighters is self-defense, and totally consistent with the O.A.S. and U.N. Charters. It is essential that the Congress continue all facets of our assistance to Central America. I want to work with you to support the democratic forces whose struggle is tied to our own security.

Tonight I have spoken of great plans and great dreams. They are dreams we can make come true. Two hundred years of American history should have taught us that nothing is impossible.

Ten years ago a young girl left Vietnam with her family; part of the exodus that followed the fall of Saigon. They came to the United States with no possessions, and not knowing a word of English. The young girl studied hard, learned English and finished high school in the top of her class. This May is a big date on her calendar. Just 10 years from the time she left Vietnam, she'll graduate from the United States Military Academy at West Point. I thought you might like to meet an American hero named Jean Nguyen.

There's someone else here tonight. Born 79 years ago, she lives in the inner city, where she cares for infants born of mothers who are heroin addicts. The children, born in withdrawal, are sometimes even dropped at her doorstep. She heals them with love. Go to her house some night and maybe you'll see her silhouette against the window, as she walks the floor talking softly, soothing a child in her arms. Mother Hale of Harlem—she, too, is an American hero.

Your lives tell us that the oldest American saying is new again: Anything is possible in America if we have the faith, the will, and the heart. History is asking us, once again, to be a force for good in the world. Let us begin—in unity, with justice, and love.

RONALD REAGAN.

STATEMENT ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. KASTEN (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S. 423. A bill to make available supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, to meet famine relief requirements of Sub-Saharan Africa, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EMERGENCY AFRICAN FAMINE RELIEF ACT

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator KENNEDY, I am introducing legislation which addresses the immediate needs of those countries in Africa suffering from drought.

The needs of these countries for life sustaining assistance and basic rehabilitation is overwhelming. The American people have watched this tragedy unfold in nearly daily media reports. They have responded through private contributions with typical American generosity. We continue to receive devastating reports about human suffering, especially in the northern areas of Ethiopia and in Southeastern Sudan where tens of thousands of refugees are streaming across from Ethiopia searching for food. One such report describes a mortality rate which "exceeds the worst days of the Kampuchean crisis or the World War II siege of Leningrad."

The legislation Senator KENNEDY and I are introducing today is significantly different from most of the approaches that have been suggested thus far to provide relief for the famine victims. Unfortunately, different quarters of Congress have gotten bogged down in arguing over what funding level is necessary, although all seem to agree with the basic premise that we should provide 50 percent of the emergency food needs, and, of course, contribute a fair share for other disaster assistance relief. This has, in some cases, resulted in partisan controversy which should have no place in this discussion. Therefore, Senator KENNEDY and I are recommending an indefinite appropriation for food, disaster assistance, and refugee assistance in order to focus on the need and the commitment, a commitment which is already being led by the American people through their private contributions. The legislation also runs through fiscal year 1986 so that we can avoid the start and stop of considering additional supplementals for this crisis. In order to ensure congressional oversight, we have written into the legislation a 15-day notification requirement so that Congress will have ample opportunity to review the use which is made of these funds and authority.

Mr. President, I do not believe I need emphasize that quick action on this or similar legislation is absolutely necessary, and, therefore, hopefully within a few days of returning after the Lincoln Day recess we will be able to act on famine relief legislation for Africa.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 423

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Emergency African Famine Relief Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes, namely:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

PUBLIC LAW 480

BILATERAL ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

FUNDS APPROPRIATED TO THE PRESIDENT

AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

INTERNATIONAL DISASTER ASSISTANCE

For an additional amount for "International disaster assistance", such sums as may be necessary for emergency disaster assistance needs of Sub-Saharan African countries before October 1, 1986, which sums shall be available only for such purpose and which sums shall remain available until September 30, 1986: Provided, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, such assistance shall be available for the furnishing of seeds and fertilizer and for the carrying out of other basic agricultural rehabilitation: Provided further, That the Committee on Appropriations of each House of Congress is notified fifteen days in advance of the obligation of any such sums.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

MIGRATION AND REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

For an additional amount for "Refugee and Migration Assistance", notwithstanding any other provision of law, such sums as may be necessary for emergency migration and refugee assistance needs of Sub-Saharan African countries before October 1, 1986, which sums shall be available only for such purpose and which sums shall remain available until September 30, 1986: Provided, That such sums may be utilized to replenish the United States Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund for commitments made for Sub-Saharan Africa in the fiscal year 1985: Provided further, That the Committee on Appropriations of each House of Congress is notified fifteen days in advance of the obligation of any such sums.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Notwithstanding section 10 of Public Law 91-672 (22 U.S.C. 2412) and section 15 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2680), funds appropriated by this Act shall be available for obligation and expenditure.

SEC. 3. The Administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall have the responsibility for determining the emergency food and disaster assistance needs for which funds are appropriated by this Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is a privilege for me to join Senator KASTEN in offering this bipartisan response to the urgent need for famine relief in Africa.

We believe there is broad support in Congress for an immediate increase in the amount of food, medicine, and other relief now being sent to refugees and famine victims in Africa. Having just returned from Ethiopia and Sudan, where the situation is especially critical, I know that the need is enormous—and that America can make an enormous difference in saving lives and reducing the dimensions of this monumental tragedy.

Since the precise dollar level is difficult to establish because of the changing circumstances in the field, we have fashioned an open-ended urgent supplemental appropriations bill to give the President sufficient flexibility to meet the need, while also maintaining congressional oversight.

The Reagan administration and the American people deserve great credit for the response that has been made so far. I welcome Senator KASTEN's leadership in ensuring that the U.S. relief effort reaches the maximum feasible level now, when relief is needed most.

The legislation we are introducing today will accomplish this goal.

By Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 424. A bill to amend the Military Selective Service Act to provide for the reinstitution of the registration and classification of persons under such act and to reinstate the authority of the President to induct persons involuntarily into the Armed Forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REINSTATING THE MILITARY DRAFT

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I do not intend or think that we in the United States will draft anybody in 1985 or perhaps even in 1986, but the ominous signs arising on the horizon indicate that what was and has been desirable to the Senator from South Carolina relative to our personnel in the Armed Forces, namely, that there be a universal call, a shared sacrifice, a cross section of our society in our Armed Forces, is becoming more and more a necessity every day.

For instance, everyone is now quoting the Bible. It was Paul who said in his letter to the Corinthians, "If the sound of the trumpet be uncertain, then who shall prepare for the battle?"

We are not emitting an uncertain sound for our Volunteer Army and our preparedness. The fact is that at Budget Committee hearings today with Secretary Weinberger and the Chairman of our Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Vessey, the picture was portrayed that would give the belief that there was no worry whatever, concerning DOD manning problems. Neither one of these gentlemen expressed real concern since we are meeting our required volunteer callups at this particular time. The truth, however, is that the Delayed Entry Program [DEP] of the Armed Forces, which is the true indicator of the potential for meeting recruiting needs, indicates that in 1985 the recruiting of nonprior service accessions in 1985 will be difficult.

The fiscal year 1985 marketing plan for the Department of Defense indicates there is a 11-percent dropoff for the DEP for the year-long period ending May 1984. In other words, the DOD recruiters have signed 12,500 fewer people to the DEP than last year. The Army is off 19 percent, the Navy 16 percent, and the Marines 12 percent. More ominous, there was an 11-percent increase in reneging on contracts by those in the DEP in 1984 over a similar period in 1983.

I would emphasize that these facts are evidence of the stiff competition facing the DOD in meeting future recruiting needs.

I further emphasize, Mr. President, that our Reserve Force are seriously in jeopardy. To begin with, one must realize that our Reserves, both the Selected Ready Reserve and the Individual Ready Reserve, are way below their war-time mobilization strengths—the Selected Reserve by over 50,000, and the Individual Ready Reserve by as much as 200,000. This makes no sense to me. We have seen recent significant increases in defense spending from $145 billion in 1980 to an adjusted $300 billion in 1985, but relatively little concern by the Department of Defense about a mobilization capability.

As I described in my initial comment, it is desirable in this Senator's opinion to return to a universal draft, I clearly see down the road a demographic fact of life which will mandate and make a universal call necessary.

I ask unanimous consent at this time to print in the RECORD the table prepared by Dr. Charles Moskos, relative to the percent of males (age 19) required for 410,000 nonprior-service males forecast until 1993.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PERCENT OF MALES (AGE 19)—NON PRIOR SERVICE (NPS)—REQUIRED TO MEET PROJECTED RECRUITING STANDARDS

Year	Males age 19 (thousands)	Percent of males required for 410,000 NPS male accessions annually[1]
		All males	Eligible males[2]	Eligible males excluding college population[3]

Mr. HOLLINGS. The facts are that of those males age 19—eligible for the draft in 1993—every other one will have to volunteer in order to meet the nonprior service accession requirements. We now need about two of five but will soon need one of two. As that ratio goes down and the constraints come—such as an economic recovery and near full employment—what you are going to find in reality is that the Volunteer Army is not going to work. It will be viewed by all outside of the service as not working.

More than anything else, Mr. President, the draft I propose is not the one we had in the Vietnam war. You mention the word "draft." Everyone jumps right back to the war in Vietnam. Nothing dismayed this Senator more than the fact in the Vietnam days that if you had cash you were either in college or in Canada. You were not in the Service doing your duty. But prior to the institution of the All-Volunteer Force in July 1973, the Congress, in response to the inequitable deferment and exemption standards of Vietnam days, tightened eligibility standards and greatly limited deferments and exemptions. Under my proposal, we would observe those tightened standards. For example, high school students could be deferred until they graduate, but in no case extending beyond the age of 20. Those in college could continue studying until the end of the semester or if in their senior year until the end of that school year. But since we all share the benefits of life here in America, under this plan we ensure that we all help shoulder the burden of defending it.

Mr. President, we need the draft for many reasons—most importantly, we need it in order to remain true to the ideals which built this country.

This is the third consecutive Congress that I have introduced draft legislation in—and I believe the need has been and continues to be the most compelling, but unrecognized, priority facing us. The ability and willingness of our Nation to meet its future security needs and those of our allies hang in the balance. Unfortunately, like in other urgencies, such as with the massive deficits, the Congress reaches a gridlock when action on the draft is warranted and has failed in its responsibility to solve the problem before time runs out.

The Department of Defense continues to cite the success of the All-Volunteer Force in reaching all of DOD's recruiting objectives. I do not for 1 minute think that the American public and our military leaders are fooled by such statistical gimmicks. We have had a recession, and our young people need jobs. It's that simple. Unemployment has been excessively high for our teenagers—particularly young blacks—where else can these people turn? The AVF is often the employer of last resort.

The AVF is a product of the Vietnam mindset. Early in the 1970's, with America's morale sapped by our involvement in Vietnam, everyone wanted the easy way for America to defend itself without personal sacrifice. So we instituted the Volunteer Army, and with that problem moved beyond arm's length, we put the whole defense problem beyond arm's length. That Volunteer Army which no longer touches every neighborhood is forgotten in appropriations and removed from everyday life in America as far as most citizens are concerned.

That attitude must change. I continually warned my colleagues when the AVF was begun in 1973 that the proposed AVF would only institutionalize the inequities of the draft—inequities which could have been remedied with much less dislocation. The Army speaks proudly of how well the AVF works, that it draws from all walks of life. Do not be fooled by these comments. The decision of 1973 insured that our Nation's defense burden would rest for the most part with the poor, the black, and the disadvantaged for years to come. And without a cross-section of representation, we have no cross-section of support. Rather than an equal call on all, we perpetuated the rich man's undemocratic lie: "We'll pay for it."

The fact is we can never pay for it. We can appropriate to cure the pay deficiencies, as we did with the large pay and benefits packages of recent years, but the fact is these were only half-way measures that did not address our long-term needs. On one end we have the equivalent of a military Job Corps. On the other end, we have middle grade officers who take home paychecks larger than those of the highest paid civilian employees or Members of Congress.

Large problems are just around the corner for the AVF as all the demographic indicators warn that the pool of 17- to 21-year-old males—the largest grouping of potential recruits—is going to fall off sharply. The "Baby Boom" is history, and the prognosis is for a rapidly shrinking recruiting pot. In 1980, there were approximately 11 million males in the 17- to 21-year-old category. By 1990, this group is projected to total less than 9 million while continuing to shrink in future years.

In 1980, the AVF was attempting to recruit one of five males 17 to 21 years old. As I stated previously, by 1993, some estimates show that the AVF—in order to meet projected recruiting goals—must get one of two males of age 19 due to the competition from an improved economy and when higher education is once again within the economic means of most young people.

The DOD is already seeing the results of heavy competition for our youth. Although recruiting quotas for fiscal year 1984 were met by the military services, the number of young men and women signed into the Delayed Entry Program [DEP], the pipeline that provides an early snapshot of the numbers of young recruits entering the Armed Forces, is encountering serious shortfalls from past years' experiences. These shortfalls are coming at a time when the Army's recruiting needs are rising—a fiscal year 1985 recruiting nonprior service goal of roughly 140,000 versus the 134,000 in fiscal year 1984.

A draft of the Army's future recruiting strategy, fiscal year 1985 marketing plan, notes that DOD-wide contract accomplishment—those in the DEP—in the top mental categories—categories I-IIIA is off 11 percent for the year-long period ending May 1984. As I have said, it is reported that DOD recruiters have signed 12,500 fewer people to the DEP than last year. The Army is off 19 percent, the Navy 16 percent, and the Marines 12 percent.

Further evidence of the stiff competition from improving employment rates is that 11 percent more in the fiscal year 1984 DEP reneged on their contracts than did those in the fiscal year 1983 DEP.

Mr. President, how will we meet the recruiting objectives in the light of competition and the demand for one out of two males. You and I both know that answer. It's money. We will once again be on the treadmill of escalating pay and benefits while diminishing arms for our troops and lessening our capability to defend ourselves and honor our worldwide commitments.

The all-volunteer approach has been a failure. It has failed to provide the necessary number of combat troops. It has failed to provide a quality defense force. And we have failed as a people to fairly and equitably distribute the burden of our national defense. Our Volunteer Forces are sadly unrepresentative of the society they serve. Over one-quarter of all new recruits are black—double their proportion in the population. The number of other minorities is growing. Further, the minority soldiers are overrepresented in combat formations such as tank, artillery, and infantry outfits, raising the specter of disproportionate casualties among minorities in wartime.

The cross-section approach of an equitable draft solves this problem. The burden would be shared by all. Exemptions can and must be kept to a minimum. Just prior to the institution of the All-Volunteer Force, and in response to the inequitable deferment and exemption standards which had been in place, we tightened eligibility standards and greatly limited deferments and exemptions. Under the proposal I am introducing today, we would observe those necessary and tightened standards. Specifically, deferments and exemptions would be limited to: First, persons on active duty, in the Reserves, or in advanced ROTC study; Second, surviving sons or brothers of those killed in war or missing-in-action; third, conscientious objectors and ministers; fourth, professions necessary to national health, like doctors; fifth, judges of courts of record and elected officials; and sixth, for students, short-term postponements of their military obligation. Those in high school could be deferred until they graduate, but in no case extending beyond age 20. And those in college could continue studying until the end of the semester or, if in their senior year, until the end of that school year. We all share the benefits of life in America; under my plan, we ensure that we all help shoulder the burden of defending it.

Mr. President, I realize that if this draft legislation is passed, the administration will not rush toward implementation of a full-scale draft for our Active Forces. But one critical factor must be considered by the DOD before rejecting out-of-hand the draft approach. This factor concerns the size and strength of U.S. Reserve Forces.

To begin with, one must realize that our Reserves, both the Selected Ready Reserve [SRR] and the Individual Ready Reserve [IRR], are way below their wartime mobilization strengths—the Selected Reserve by over 50,000 and the Individual Ready Reserve by as much as 200,000.

We have a need now to shore up these forces. A draft can do that. It is the sponsors' wish that President Reagan use the draft to build up to and sustain a Reserve force and capability that meets our mobilization need. That is the minimum that is required, and it is required as soon as possible.

The cost, the concept, the civil wrong of a Volunteer Army are bad enough, but more than anything, it has required a civilization. That process can keep the Army content and happy in peacetime, but in war it fairly well guarantees that the soldier will not fight. Anyone who has ever served in war realizes that the motivation to kill, to defend, to advance, to hold an untenable spot all springs from a unit loyalty—a loyalty developed from working together, playing together, training together, staying together, and sacrificing together. It is an inner discipline; it is a developed pride for the organization that you are a part of. But to give the Volunteer Army appearances of success and harmony, civilization has taken over. Soldiers stay off camp or fort with their wives, weekends are off with their families, promotions are made with little regard to merit, and the commander that breaks down his barracks and finds drugs can only turn in the drugs and not the man because civilian law has taken over and a warrant is required. Turning the Army into a microcosm of the office down the street does not suffice. The kind of camaraderie needed to weld an effective fighting force cannot flourish in an atmosphere where the military is a part-time chore. Defending America is not a 9-to-5 job.

More than anything else, again, Mr. President, conscience tells us that we need a cross-section of America in our Armed Forces. Defense is everyone's business.

For the most advantaged of society to be dependent upon the least advantage in our society for our defense is a dangerous anachronism.

The great need, Mr. President, today is not so much a demonstration of military power; the great need is a demonstration of will power.

You can take the MX's, the B-1's, and the billions and billions of dollars appropriated for defense, that makes us act like we are strong. But that does not prove strength. There is one single action that would send the proper signal to the Soviets that action is for a universal call on the people in our land to defend our country. Russia would know then and there that the President, the Congress, and the people of America were united and that we were committed to the defense of freedom. While, yes the call to reinstitute the draft and the various selective service boards and the bureaucracy with it might cost a little under $1 billion, in the end it will mean not only the country having a stronger defense, but we will save billions of dollars. I want to address the subject raised Monday by OMB Director Stockman and discussed in this Chamber yesterday.

Mr. Stockman called the military pension system a scandal, outrageous.

What is disturbing to me from my experience in both military and civilian life, with 35 years service in public office, is the typical approach of laying blame at the wrong source.

We have a very generous policy with respect to the military in order to try to develop that volunteer Army. We have over $1 billion that we expend recruiting, and the recruitment officers go out and they do not talk patriotism. You have seen the TV ad, "Where the action is," and everything else. We tell them, "Come on in where the action is, in the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines; get in the action. Run into the place and volunteer right away." What are they promised if they do? They are promised that if they stay in 20 years a lifetime retirement is theirs. The average retirement age now is at 42 years, and the life expectancy is 74, so they have 32 years coming on where they will receive total retirement and pension benefits. They will be paid way more out of the Army than what they were paid in the Army.

But that is what, Mr. President, you and I promised them. That is our policy.

When Mr. Stockman jumps on the military—and while I complain about not getting the quality personnel I want in the Volunteer Army—at least they have sense enough to know what the contract is. Remember they have been told, "Come on in, you have post exchange rights, and you have commissary rights," and the Grace Commission calls that waste, fraud, and abuse. "Come on in and you get this retirement and pension benefits," and Dave Stockman calls it outrageous and a scandal, and they are a little wary and wonder what is going on.

If Mr. Stockman is so senseless as to feel that somehow he cannot get them to yield, there is no reason to yield. They have been given a contract. They were given that inducement, and they do not want to see the promises reneged upon and unkept.

They are keeping their part of the contract. They are staying and working hard in the All-Volunteer Force. They say "Do not come now Mr. Congressman, because you have a problem, whether they be with revenues or overspending, on the massive deficits. Do not come now and change my contract. That is how you got me in."

That is the promise made, and my support of a military draft is not going to go back on the contract made with those in the All-Volunteer Force at this point. But, on the contrary, we must begin to educate the American public as to where we are headed and what is going to be needed and what should be desired.

We have many things later on to point out with respect to our military budget, which I supported and continue to support over the years.

We have a gridlock due to a "staff" infection. We have overstaffed militarily and civilian wise in staff in that Pentagon, but I will elaborate on that at a later time.

But for the present moment, with respect to universal call, let it be stated on behalf of the military that we promised a better retirement system than for civilians.

That is not to be justified by the Pentagon. That is to be justified in this Chamber. We set that policy affirmatively. We wanted to give them more because we had to try to induce them to come into the All-Volunteer Force. Now that we have all other troubles relative to the budget, do not go around wrangling with our military who are trying to do the job as best they can at the present time.

I still do not think, of course, that the best they can do is fulfilling the defense needs here in the United States, and I respectfully submit this universal draft bill, in conjunction with my esteemed colleague, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS].

In fairness to ourselves as a people, we need the draft—a universal draft, not the kind with all the exemptions that caused so much bitterness during Vietnam—a draft that would reflect the true character of America's greatness. We must provide for the reinstitution of registration and classification and for the reinstatement of the President's authority to induct individuals. We cannot respond to crises around the world unless our forces are significantly improved. The Joint Chiefs tell us so.

Conscience tells us that we need a cross-section of America in our Armed Forces. Defense is everybody's business. It is everybody's responsibility. Even if we had the money to make the All Volunteer Army work, a professional army is un-American. It is an anathema to a democratic republic—a glaring civil wrong. Not until it makes an equal call on rich and poor alike, educated and uneducated, white and black, will it be a true reflection of us as a people. America benefits when serving alongside the high school dropout is the Harvard graduate who goes on to win the Navy cross. A free society defended by the least free is a dangerous contradiction.

The great need of the hour is not so much a demonstration of military power. The great need for America is willpower. We lack credibility. If it is strength that must be shown the Soviets in order to obtain arms control, then better than all the MX's and B-1's and billions and billions of dollars—a universal military draft will get them to take notice. Ever since Vietnam, we have receded and withdrawn, refusing to commit. The lesson should have been learned by now that a President's commitment counts for little unless it reflects the commitment of the people.

The direction of our foreign policy, the power of our newest weaponry, and the number of dollars in the defense budget are meaningless unless we, as a people, are committed to the task of protecting a nation and aiding our allies—allies who by and large do maintain systems of military conscription.

From all of these standpoints then, Mr. President, the lack of military cohesiveness, extravagant cost, and primarily the unequal sharing of equal responsibilities—America needs the draft.

Mr. President, in a recent interview printed in the October 1, 1984, edition of U.S. News and World Report, General Bernard Rogers, commander of NATO Armed Forces, spoke of the need for a universal draft. I ask unanimous consent that General Rogers' remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW NATO'S TOP OFFICER VIEWS THE ALLIANCE

Gen. Bernard Rogers, commander of NATO armed forces in Europe, has assessed for correspondents the challenges confronting the alliance. Excerpts:

The real Soviet threat.—The biggest challenge we face in NATO is getting the message across to our people that there is a threat to their freedom down the road.

I am not talking about an attack out of the blue. My major concern is that the Soviets will accomplish the objective they've set in Western Europe, that they'll be able, without ever having to fire a shot, to coerce us and intimidate us. That is the major menace we face.

Reliance on nuclear arms.—If we were attacked conventionally, under the guidance I have from my political authorities, I have no option but to fairly quickly request the release of nuclear weapons.

Under current conditions—not sufficient ammunition stocks, not sufficient trained manpower to replace battlefield losses and not sufficient pre-positioned material such as tanks and armored personnel carriers—I must make that request fairly quickly. I do not like that.

Launching nuclear weapons.—I would send an early notification of possible use of nuclear weapons to my political authorities and say to them, if I have to use [such weapons], this is what we're thinking about. It's these kinds of militarily significant targets.

How long would it take?—Not as long as you think. You see, we have exercises here twice a year [to test decision making]. Hopefully, by the time I would have to send forward a request to use nuclear weapons, the [political authorities] would have considered all of the aspects, and I could get an answer back quickly. . . .

And if I get attacked with nuclear weapons and there's no time for consultations, I can go directly to leaders of the nuclear powers and request the release of nuclear weapons. . . . All this would have to be decided at a political level. Don't ever forget that.

Role of emerging technology.—We infantrymen have a rule of thumb: If you can reduce the ratio against which you have to defend to no more than 3 of them to 1 of us—and you have properly organized your defensive position—you can succeed in your defense.

To me, it makes sense to build on what we already have. For example, if we were able to design a precision guided missile that has 30 submunitions within its warhead and each submunition was to search out an individual tank, you could get 20 hits out of 30. Say that weapon would cost $500,000. That would be pretty cost-effective.

Europe's contribution to NATO.—If we go to war tomorrow, 90 percent of the land forces and three quarters of the air and navy would be Western European. In addition, most people do not realize the massive amount of hidden costs that Western European nations pay. Conscription has a hidden cost, a social cost, a personal cost, a human cost. . . .

I also know that Western European nations provide many facilities for which they get no return, not in taxes, not in revenue or anything.

In the end, I don't think it does too much good to point the finger at each other.

Need for a U.S. draft.—We need the draft today. . . . I have maintained through the past seven years that for that purpose (providing skilled replacements) the U.S. should draft sufficient men to be trained in those combat skills [using] random selection so an individual would be eligible for only one year.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, we should listen to the words once again of John F. Kennedy—"Ask not what your country can do for you: Ask what you can do for your country." Mr. President, there is no painless way that we can provide for the defense of freedom.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. 453 App.) is amended by inserting "(a)" before "Except" at the beginning of such section and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The President shall, at the earliest practicable date, but not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this subsection, begin the registration and classification of citizens and other persons described in subsection (a) of this section.".

SEC. 2. Section 17(c) of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 467(c)) is amended by striking out "July 1, 1973" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1998".

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise to compliment the Senator from South Carolina on his remarks. I agree with much of what he has had to say here today and I praise him for introducing this legislation and, in so doing, join with him as a cosponsor of the bill to amend the Military Selective Service Act to provide for the reinstitution of the registration and classification of persons under such act, and to reinstate the authority of the President to induct persons involuntarily into the Armed Forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, the major purpose of the bill—and I think Senator HOLLINGS spoke to it quite ably—is to enhance the credibility of the U.S. military capability. There is an old saying in politics; "What is perceived oftentimes becomes the truth." When we speak of politics we must recognize that our Armed Forces are an extension of the United States ability to project its political wishes.

President Reagan is a firm supporter of the volunteer armed forces. He is committed to that. He has certainly enhanced the capability of the United States with respect to the perception in which we are viewed around the world. The address he delivered to this Nation last night was heard not only in all the nooks and crannies of the United States, but also all parts of the world.

The leadership and confidence which President Reagan, who is the leader of the free world, exudes to our country provides a sense of optimism and sends a message that is much more important than how many dollars we have, how many weapons systems we have, how many MX's we have, or how many pieces of equipment we have. It provides the perception that the United States is willing to demonstrate its will to defend people who are trying to defend their own liberties in this world, whether they be the freedom fighters in Afghanistan or the people in Nicaragua.

I support this bill for its policy purposes only. This bill is to point out the need to maintain our national will and determination for a selfdefense. It will allow the President of the United States to develop the appropriate policy to meet the manpower needed for a strong military force. This policy would be for the 1990's and beyond.

That is the reason why I join Senator HOLLINGS in this legislation today. I think the time will come, as the manpower pool shrinks and as the economy continues to grow, that we will have to take a careful look at how much money we can afford with respect to our personnel costs and with respect to defense.

More important than the cost is the dedication, the sense of purpose, the sense of service, and the sense of commitment to this country that we need on the part of our young people, so that there is the attitude in the United States that if the call comes, we, the American people, are going to insure our peace and our freedom by whatever means necessary.

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BYRD, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. LEAHY):

S. 425. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to establish a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ARTHRITIS AND MUSCULOSKELETAL AND SKIN DISEASES ACT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to once again introduce legislation to create a separate Arthritis Institute in the National Institutes of Health. As before, Senator CRANSTON, who authored the National Arthritis Act of 1974, and Senator HATCH, chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, are joining me as coauthors of the bill. Also, Senator SYMMS, who has contributed much personal time to the advancement of this measure, and my colleague from Arizona, Mr. DECONCINI, are among the original coauthors. We are joined by several other Senators.

For 5 years, a number of us have attempted to get a bill enacted that would provide for concentrated research by a separate unit of the National Institutes of Health in the field of arthritis. The measure has passed the Senate twice before and last year, on October 9, just before adjournment, both Houses of Congress cleared the legislation, S. 540, and sent it to the White House where it was unfortunately vetoed on very weak grounds. In fact, I think much of the reasoning given in the veto message pertained to an earlier version of S. 540 and did not take account of substantial revisions which were made in conference.

As passed by Congress last October, S. 540 included other subjects relating to biomedical research and the NIH that were not in the bill as first introduced. We are today returning to the original, basic concept of establishing a new and separate institute devoted exclusively to arthritis related diseases. Those subjects that were later added to S. 540 and are unrelated to arthritis have been deleted from the bill we are introducing today. They can be addressed in a separate NIH bill.

Mr. President, over 40 million people in this country suffer from chronic arthritis and there is of now no known cure. There is not even any scientific knowledge of the origin of the problem, nor can we identify one single source. This bill will offer realistic hope to these people, who suffer from arthritis without having any real assurance that they are going to someday be rid of the problem.

In human terms, concentration of research efforts in a single institute can lead to developments that will ease or cure the miserable pain and immobility suffered by the millions afflicted with arthritis. Moreover, for a small investment in treating and preventing arthritis, it would ultimately save hundreds of millions of dollars to the Federal Government that are now spent in Medicare payments, Federal employee disability compensation and high health insurance premiums directly associated with arthritis.

The health community informs me that researchers are on the verge of breakthroughs in this area. All they need is a concentration of the research effort.

Mr. President, I hope that all of my colleagues will join with us in supporting the bill and transferring arthritis to a separate institute where something truly worthwhile can be accomplished, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 425

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, once again I join Senator GOLDWATER and my other colleagues in the Senate in sponsoring legislation to create a National Institute on Arthritis, Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases at the National Institutes of Health. This marks the third Congress in which similar legislation has been introduced. Both Houses of Congress have separately and jointly passed legislation creating an arthritis institute, but we have yet to succeed in getting it signed into law.

Arthritis is our country's No. 1 cripple—36 million Americans of all ages are afflicted by this serious and sometimes fatal disease. An additional 1 million Americans are diagnosed as having arthritis each year. In my home State of Utah, more than 230,000 people are afflicted with arthritis. Most of the 100 or so forms of arthritis are caused by degenerative factors, and there is no known cure.

Without a cure, arthritis victims suffer throughout their life. The disease denies them the mobility and independence that otherwise healthy Americans enjoy. Arthritis victims are limited in the places they can go and the things they can do. Many victims find they must change jobs, abandon hobbies, or find new social interests that will fit in with their new life style. It is in the best interest of our citizens to focus a national research effort on the prevention, diagnosis, treatment, and eventual cure of arthritis and other related debilitating diseases.

Billions of dollars are spent annually on arthritis—for research, prevention, treatment, and cures. For many victims, the pain is so great that they will try almost anything to relieve it. Americans spent almost $2 billion in 1984 on questionable and unproven remedies that promise fast, easy relief for arthritis. This represents a financial burden for the families of arthritis sufferers, and eventually robs our economy. A focused national research effort on arthritis can help curb the financial costs to families, employers, and the Government by reducing the costs of health care and disability.

Arthritis is not hopeless. Ours is the first generation that can ease the pain of most forms of arthritis. Arthritis victims are receiving more relief for their suffering now than they did a few years ago. This represents progress and provides hope for even more relief in the future. But "controlling" a problem is not a "cure." Much work remains to be done in arthritis research to more effectively treat, and to find the much needed cures for these diseases.

This is the hope my colleagues and I share along with the millions of arthritis sufferers. However, arthritis is not the only debilitating disease affecting our citizens. Many other musculoskeletal and skin diseases afflict Americans and limit their freedom and independence. There is neither sufficient scientific knowledge to understand their causes nor to provide adequate treatment to relieve pain and disability.

The establishment of a National Institute on Arthritis, Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases represents a significant research investment. It is my hope that the scientific community will make major advances in the prevention, treatment, and cure of arthritis and skin diseases through a more concerted research effort. A greater Federal effort would also provide the incentive and encouragement to the private sector to support research programs which complement publicly funded research.

Strong public support for the creation of the arthritis institute helped push a similar bill through the 98th Congress. Thousands of people wrote to me in support of that bill. An article in one paper alone prompted more than 8,000 responses encouraging this effort. Most of these letters were written by individuals suffering from arthritis or members of their families—people with personal experience with the pain and suffering caused by arthritis. Now is the time for Congress to respond to their pleas by once again sending to the President legislation creating a National Institute on Arthritis.

I encourage all of my colleagues to join us in this legislative endeavor which offers hope to millions of suffering Americans.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join once again with the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] in reintroducing a bill to establish a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases within the National Institutes of Health. If enacted, this legislation would help to promote our Nation's research efforts for some of the most prevalent and devastating diseases afflicting our society.

Mr. President, this marks the third time that Senator GOLDWATER and I have introduced a bill to establish a new National Arthritis Institute. We are joined in cosponsoring this legislation by many of our colleagues who were supporters of similar legislation that was proposed during the last two Congresses. In the 97th Congress, our bill, S. 1939, passed the Senate, and a similar measure was included in the House-passed H.R. 6457. However, no final action was taken on either of those measures. In the 98th Congress, the Senate passed S. 540—with 47 cosponsors—on May 24, 1984. The House-passed version of S. 540 included the Senate bill as one provision of a wide-ranging measure that would have reauthorized appropriations for the NIH. Both Houses agreed to the conference report on October 9, 1984. Unfortunately, despite strong bipartisan support in the House and the Senate, the President pocket-vetoed the bill.

Mr. President, the Senate has demonstrated overwhelmingly on two prior occasions its desire and intention to establish a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases. I am hopeful that my colleagues will do so once again and that this time our effort to turn this legislation into law will be successful.

Mr. President, before describing the provisions of our bill, I would like to discuss briefly what we know about arthritis, its nature and incidence, and its costs to the Nation.

WHAT IS ARTHRITIS?

Arthritis is a form of musculoskeletal disease. It attacks the body's movable joints and connective tissues, sometimes resulting in systemic complications with critical damage to major organs. Actually, arthritis is a generic term covering more than 100 forms of diseases that afflict 37 million Americans—15 percent of the U.S. population. Approximately one out of every seven citizens has some form of arthritis. Each year, about 1 million more Americans fall victim to this painful and debilitating disorder. Over 20 million Americans suffer from arthritis severe enough that they seek a physician's help. In 1978, 549,000 hospitalizations were due to arthritis-related diseases.

Arthritis is usually thought of as a condition of old age. It affects more than 40 percent of people over age 65. But it afflicts old and young alike. A particularly devastating form of the disease is juvenile arthritis which affects over 250,000 children. The incidence of arthritis among children is now higher than that of polio during the most severe epidemics of the past. As in the case of cancer and heart conditions, when a chronic disease such as arthritis strikes a child, it can often be much more serious than an adult case. Juvenile arthritis can stunt growth, blind, cripple, and deform, and it can kill. Over half of the children afflicted with this disease carry crippling handicaps into their adult years.

An estimated 6.5 million Americans are victims of rheumatoid arthritis, the most devastating and crippling form of arthritis. It is a chronic disease that leads to permanent joint deformities and lifelong disability. Rheumatoid arthritis is especially insidious; it progresses rapidly and can be a systemic disease damaging other organs, such as the lungs, heart, or the eyes. This disease strikes individuals of all ages from the very young to the very old and affects women three times as often as men. Its cause is unknown.

Osteoarthritis is the most common form of arthritis. According to the National Health Examination Survey for 1960 to 1962, over 37.4 percent of the population aged 18 to 79 had some form of osteoarthritis. For those individuals age 75 and over, the incidence of the disease was as high as 86 percent. Due to aging trends in the population, the incidence of osteoarthritis is probably much higher than these figures would indicate.

Although osteoarthritis usually develops more slowly and is milder and less painful than rheumatoid arthritis, it is a progressive condition that can in its later stages produce extreme pain and disability. Over 10 million Americans have osteoarthritis severe enough to cause painful problems seriously affecting their ability to perform their daily activities and their jobs.

Osteoarthritis often develops after traumatic injury to a joint. According to a 1971 survey, there were 17 million significant injuries associated with sports and recreational activities plus 11 million disabling injuries resulting from non-sports-related accidents. Of these roughly 28 million accidents, about 80 percent, or 22 million, involved the musculoskeletal system—more than 2 million involved joint injuries. Despite the long-term consequences and the seriousness of posttraumatic osteoarthritis and the incidence of the disease, little research has been conducted in this special field.

Other arthritis-related diseases are particularly prevalent among women.

Osteoporosis, a disease resulting in brittle bones due to a loss of calcium from the bones, is a leading cause of nursing home placements. It occurs in varying degrees in many elderly persons. However, nearly 90 percent of women 75 years of age and older show x ray evidence of some degree of this disease.

Systemic lupus erthematosus, a potentially fatal connective tissue disease, is one of the most frequent, serious disorders in women of childbearing age. An estimated 50,000 new cases of this disease are diagnosed each year, indicating that the disease is far more common than it was formerly thought to be.

THE ECONOMIC COSTS OF ARTHRITIS

Mr. President, the financial costs of arthritis to patients, insurance companies, and taxpayers are staggering. The Arthritis Foundation estimated that in 1982, Americans paid $14.5 billion for costs related to arthritis—nearly 5 percent of our current national health-care bill. In 1980, approximately $1 billion of what was spent for arthritis was spent on quack remedies. The physical and emotional costs to the victims of the disease and their families are enormous.

In 1971, over 27 million workdays were lost to arthritis-related disabilities. This represented over $5 billion in wages lost to employees.

Individuals with arthritis account for about 19 percent of those receiving social security disability insurance—SSDI—benefits. Although many workers with arthritis remain on the job as long as possible, some 500,000 workers disabled by arthritis and forced by the intense pain and physical limitations that they suffer to leave their jobs are today collecting SSDI benefits. The cost to the Nation for these payments in fiscal year 1983 alone is estimated to have been $2.8 billion. If payments for their dependents are included, this figure is estimated to be as high as $3.3 billion.

THE NEED FOR A STRONGER APPROACH FOR ARTHRITIS RESEARCH

Mr. President, research is the best investment we can make to help arthritis sufferers. As the author of the National Arthritis Act of 1974—Public Law 93-640—and amendments to it in 1976 and 1980, I have long been acutely aware of the needs of and potential for research into arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases. It is clear to me that we need a stronger approach to arthritis research. Although the National Arthritis Act of 1974 has been successsful in establishing sound strategies for the utilization of our national resources to wage a stronger attack against arthritis, and progress in biomedical research has substantially increased our knowledge of the disease, implementation of that law has fallen short of what should have been achieved and far short of what could be gained through an accelerated research effort into this important area of study.

The National Arthritis Act of 1974 provided for the design of a master arthritis research plan—the so-called national arthritis plan—to identify the areas of research to be pursued, the resources available for arthritis research, and the additional resources needed for research progress. The act also authorized the creation of research and demonstration centers to provide an opportunity for intensive interdisciplinary arthritis research as well as training in and demonstration of advanced diagnostic, prevention, treatment, and control methods related to arthritis. Unfortunately, the budget levels recommended under the plan for arthritis-related research within NIH have not been realized.

Part of the reason that arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin disease research has not received the focus and priority it warrants is that it is lumped within the current institute, NIADDK, with an incongruous mixture of disease categories. Congressional intent to focus research on arthritis-related diseases under the original National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases has been diluted over time by the combination of so many disparate research programs under NIADDK. That Institute now includes in its mission—in addition to arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases—diabetes, kidney diseases, digestive diseases, nutrition, endocrinology, urology, and hematology.

Within the current Institute, arthritis lacks the focus, direction, and visibility that are essential to a comprehensive and integrated research program addressing one of our country's major health problems. The existing structure has led to funding disparities within NIADDK. In the last 12 years, funding for arthritis research has grown from 7.8 percent of the total NIADDK budget in 1970 to 16.9 percent in 1982. By comparison, in 1970, diabetes funding amounted to 5.5 percent of that Institute's budget, and by 1982, funding for diabetes research had grown to 35.3 percent of the NIADDK's total budget.

The funding recommendations originally proposed under the national arthritis plan reflect the human and economic costs of arthritis and related diseases. To reduce those costs, we need to move far closer to the levels of support and national commitment called for in the plan.

Given the Reagan administration's shrinking budget for our overall Federal research effort, I believe we must develop policies for using limited financial resources more effectively and efficiently so that we can gain the maximum benefits for our efforts. By establishing a separate National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases, we would provide arthritis-related issues with the greater visibility they should have at the national level and hence enable researchers in these areas to compete more successfully for increasingly scarce resources. Most important, the creation of a separate institute for arthritis-related research would attract new, high quality scientists and lead to an accelerated, better coordinated research effort into the causes, prevention, and treatment of arthritis. These have been the results of the establishment of other institutes specializing in a one-family or other logical grouping of disorders such as the National Eye Institute and the National Institute on Aging. Thus, this legislation would facilitate the implementation of high-priority programs as authorized by the National Arthritis Act of 1974 and the national arthritis plan.

Mr. President, S. 540 in the 98th Congress included a provision requiring that a study be conducted of the effectiveness of the existing combinations of disease research programs within the individual institutes of NIH and of what standards should be applied in the future in establishing additional new institutes. Before any action was taken on the bill, the Assistant Secretary for Health, in the spring of 1983, contracted with the Institute of Medicine [IOM], of the National Academy of Sciences, to undertake such a study. The findings of the study were published in an October 1984 report entitled, "Responding to Health Needs and Scientific Opportunity: The Organizational Structure of the National Institutes of Health."

The report recommended five criteria for evaluating organizational changes within the NIH. I believe that the proposed new institute meets each of those criteria.

The first criterion states: "The activity of a new institute or other organizational entity must be compatible with the research and research training mission of NIH."

The new institute clearly meets this criterion; it would provide for the expansion of the current research effort on arthritis that currently is being carried out in the NIH and is, obviously, fully compatible with the mission of the NIH.

The second criterion states: "It must be demonstrable that the research area of a new institute is not already receiving adequate or appropriate attention."

Although arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases afflict more than 15 percent of the total U.S. population, in 1983, just 2 percent of the entire NIH research budget is devoted to arthritis-related research. The Federal Government, through NIH, annually spends on arthritis research only $1.50 per person afflicted with arthritis in this country. Several hundred times that amount each year is spent per patient on cancer research.

The level of support for arthritis research is simply not commensurate with the prevalence and severity of the disease. With 35 million people afflicted and an estimated annual cost of $18 billion in hospital costs, drugs, and lost productivity—in comparison, 10.5 million people have diabetes at an estimated annual cost of $10 billion—arthritis research receives less than one-half the funding of diabetes research.

The third criterion states: "There must be reasonable prospects for scientific growth in a research area to justify the investment of a new institute."

Research in arthritis, as with other disease research, relies on discoveries in the basic sciences—for instance, genetics, infectious agents, and immunology. Recent discoveries in those areas, such as genetic engineering and monoclonal antibodies, are enabling far-reaching advances to be made in understanding the causes of arthritis, and will be invaluable in the development of treatments for many forms of arthritis. The 1984 annual report of the National Arthritis Advisory Board concluded:

> The probabilities are high that in the next decade a cause of certain diseases will be elucidated, or that the specific immune response genes will be localized, or that the exact mechanisms of inflammatory responses will be defined. Perhaps an effective cure or prevention of one or more of these crippling, chronic diseases will be defined.

The Board also recommended that the Multipurpose Arthritis Centers Program be expanded to enable the swift and effective application of available knowledge for the treatment of patients with arthritis and related musculoskeletal diseases. There is no question that ample room for scientific growth and progress as well as good prospects for achieving them exist in arthritis research—and those are precisely the reasons for establishing an institute.

The fourth criterion states: "There must be reasonable prospects of sufficient funding for a new institute."

There has been repeated concern that the administrative costs associated with the establishment of a new institute would drain research dollars. However, because much of the administrative costs would be transferred from those presently allocated to the arthritis division, added costs were estimated in 1982 to total $1.8 million. Ongoing administrative costs could be further minimized through the sharing of support staffs and services, as recommended in the IOM report.

The current funding level for arthritis-related research is far short of that recommended in the national arthritis plan. The plan recommended that funds be doubled in 1977 for arthritis-related research and that thereafter funding be increased annually by about 20 percent through 1980. However, those levels of funding for arthritis within the NIADDK have never been realized. The result has been that, during the period 1977 through 1981, substantially less than half of the arthritis-related research grant applications that were approved for funding have been able to be funded by the NIADDK. At such time as additional resources are made available to NIH, arthritis-related research should clearly be one of the top priorities for new funding.

The fifth criterion states: "A proposed change in the NIH organizational structure should, on balance, improve communication, management, priority setting, and accountability."

Within the structure of the NIADDK, a separate division exists for the administration of research in arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases. Likewise, diabetes, digestive diseases, and kidney research are each administered under individual division. Thus, separating the arthritis division from the remainder of the institute would not impose a new organizational system in the administration of those research areas.

The IOM report expressed concern that the benefits derived from a broad-based approach to research—in which many research areas are integrated—must be balanced against the need for increased visibility and focus. In the case of NIADDK, however, there is very little crossover of research interests among scientists investigating digestive diseases or diabetes, on the one hand, and arthritis, on the other. In fact, arthritis research shares more common ground with research ongoing at the Institute on Allergies and Infectious Diseases than it does with research in its present institute.

Arthritis research within the NIADDK is overshadowed by the research on diabetes and kidney diseases. A separate institute devoted to arthritis-related research—with enhanced visibility—would contribute to greater public accountability, and lead to more consistency in program missions.

Finally, the IOM report suggested seven alternative means to the establishment of a new institute for increasing visibility of a research area. They include publicizing the accomplishments of scientific research; forming a special advisory board; holding major conferences; upgrading organizational status; disseminating results of research to clinical centers; improving the grant application process; and forming an NIH-wide committee to develop research in the area.

As part of the national arthritis plan, begun 10 years ago, these recommendations have already been implemented to a substantial degree—the National Arthritis Advisory Board, for instance, has been active since 1977. Yet, the fact remains that the current effort falls far short of the activity level that could be considered commensurate with the magnitude or urgency of the disease.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ARTHRITIS AND MUSCULOSKELETAL AND SKIN DISEASES

Mr. President, the statutory authority for the establishment of the new National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases would be patterned after that of other NIH research institutes. Thus, the new institute would be directed to undertake research and demonstrations related to the causes, prevention, and treatment of arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases; to promote coordination of research programs in the public and private sector; to make grants for research; to establish an information clearinghouse and data system; and to conduct and support research training. This is the same mandate that the current NIADDK has with respect to arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases. In addition, in very fitting recognition of the tremendous number of traumatic musculoskeletal injuries that Americans receive in sports and other recreational activities, the new institute would include in its focus research on sports-related disorders.

The National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases would receive its funding under the existing authority of section 301 of the Public Health Service Act, as is the case for most other NIH Institutes. Because the present organizational division pertaining to arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin diseases within NIADDK is already autonomous in many of its functions, the benefits to be gained from the greater visibility for such research would more than compensate for any increase in administrative costs—which is not likely to be substantial. In order to facilitate the administrative separation of the new institute from the present NIADDK, our bill would provide for the orderly and fair transfer to the new institute of all resources that are related to arthritis and musculoskeletal and skin disease research programs and activities currently being carried out by the NIADDK.

The legislation would also extend, for the next 3 fiscal years, the authorizations of appropriations, which would otherwise expire at the end of fiscal year 1985, for the National Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases Data System, the National Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases Information Clearinghouse, the Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases Demonstration Projects, and the Multipurpose Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases Centers.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, we cannot afford to ignore the need to find ways to improve the quality of life for those unfortunate individuals who suffer from arthritis. An accelerated research effort in arthritis has great potential to bring us much closer to providing these millions of individuals with relief from their pain and the potential for full participation in everyday activities.

Thus, I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation, and I urge that the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, to which our bill will be referred, give it prompt and careful consideration. I pledge to my good friend the distinguished chairman [Mr. HATCH] who is a principal cosponsor of this measure, and the very able ranking Democratic Member [Mr. KENNEDY] my full cooperation and assistance in the further development and progress of this legislation.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I wish to add my strong support to those who have labored during the last 4 years to effect the establishment of a separate institute for arthritis and related diseases at the National Institutes of Health.

Arthritis is our Nation's No. 1 disabling disease, affecting nearly 37 million persons in America, or 1 of every 7 people. Those affected may suffer from any of the 100 distinct disease entities, ranging in scope and severity from scleroderma to gout, to ankylosing spondylitis, lupus, and rheumatoid arthritis.

Although arthritis and musculoskeletal diseases effect all ages, 40 percent of the population over 65 has a rheumatic disease. And, as our Nation's population ages, the prevalence of arthritis will increase as the elderly population expands from 10 percent to 20 percent by the year 2030.

The National Center for Health Statistics predicts that in the year 2000, less than 20 years from now, expenses attributable to arthritis will reach nearly $100 billion annually. Arthritis and other musculoskeletal diseases are responsible for major costs of workers' compensation, Social Security benefits, Medicare payments, and hospital and nursing home stays. And, regretfully, nearly $1 billion is spent annually by arthritis sufferers who purchase or seek out unproven drugs and treatments.

Of equal, if not greater importance, are the indirect personal losses in productivity resulting from lack of wages or inability to earn a livelihood, due to a limiting or disabling disease such as arthritis.

I believe that the magnitude of the human and economic impact of arthritis on the Nation demands the sharp national focus of this family of disease that only a separate institute can bring.

The National Arthritis Act of 1974 proposed the creation of a separate arthritis institute. The National Commission on Arthritis and Related Musculoskeletal Diseases, established by that act, set forth some 150 specific recommendations to be addressed in order to adequately promote a national attack on arthritis. The essence of the Commission's findings was that the vast impact of arthritis on the Nation has not been matched by a determination to accelerate research and training to improve the treatment of rheumatic diseases, to prevent them, and to find cures for them.

The health sciences are in an extraordinary period of advancement, and competition for research funds is keen. But the promising discoveries made in the arthritis field in recent years support our belief that with adequate funding and focused research priority, some forms of arthritis might be prevented, cures may be found, and therapies developed to improve the condition of arthritis victims.

As many of you know, I have actively supported the establishment of a separate institute for arthritis, along with Senators GOLDWATER, HATCH, CRANSTON, DOLE, and others. We believe that a separate institute would provide the environment for an accelerated research effort in arthritis, musculoskeletal and skin diseases. These diseases afflict more than 15 percent of the total U.S. population, but in 1983 just 2 percent of the entire NIH research budget was devoted to arthritis-related research.

I urge the support of my fellow Senators in approving this legislation to authorize in statute a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases.

By Mr. WALLOP (for himself, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. GARN, Mr. HECHT, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DENTON, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. DODD):

S. 426. A bill to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection to electric consumers; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators SIMPSON, GARN, HECHT, GOLDWATER, HEFLIN, WILSON, LAXALT, CRANSTON, DENTON, CHAFEE, MURKOWSKI, and DODD today to introduce legislation which would clarify the procedures under which the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC] will relicense hydroelectric projects throughout the Nation in the years ahead.

Across the West, and indeed across the Nation the gold rush of the 1980's is underway. Today's fortune seekers are pursuing two things, water and gradient, to run electrical turbines. When new sites are unavailable for hydrodevelopment, utilities are competing for expiring FERC licenses coming up for renewal. Caught in the collision is the ratepaying public. The hydropower boom is thereby causing a reappraisal of the relicensing procedures established in the Federal Power Act of 1920 by Congress.

Specifically, my bill amends section 7 of the Federal Power Act by deleting all reference to section 15, which covers relicensing. The effect of this amendment is to clarify that the municipal preference does not apply in a relicense proceeding, whether or not the existing licensee is the applicant.

Section 15 of the Federal Power Act of 1920 is also amended to require the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to consider, within the context of section 10(a) of the act, the existing licensee's plans for the next license term. If these plans comply with the section 10(a) public interest standards, a new license would be issued to the existing licensee. Section 10(a) of the Federal Power Act mandates an extensive inquiry into all factors relevant to the public interest in the development of the power potential of the Nation's water resources. This helps ensure that the plan adopted by the Commission is the best adapted to serve goals intended to achieve the most beneficial use of the waters. Conservation, recreation and commercial power are public interest considerations under the act.

Only if the Commission determines the existing licensee's plan does not comport with the section 10(a) standards would the Commission be authorized to issue the new license to a competing applicant. In that event the existing licensee who fails to get a successor license would be compensated by the new licensee for the facilities being turned over under a just compensation standard. This is a change from the law's present standard of net investment and severance damages which was set out in 1920 under vastly different economic conditions than those facing regulated utility companies today.

The need for these changes is quite clear. It is prompted by conflicting decisions rendered by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and the fact that over 200 FERC regulated utility licenses are coming up for renewal by 1993. For those of you who wish the details, I refer you to my statement of May 24, 1984 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page S. 6451. The statement I made at the time I originally introduced the bill is reprinted there. It contains a relevant history of the Federal Power Act and some of the technological and regulatory changes which have taken place since the act's enactment some 65 years ago.

I will only reiterate that the current state of uncertainty is harmful to the present public interest. This is the case because FERC has reversed itself on this issue. In a 1980 ruling in city of Bountiful, UT, FERC held a municipal preference did apply against existing license holders at the time of relicensing. That opinion was subsequently affirmed by the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals.

However, FERC reversed its 1980 decision in 1983 in the Merwin Dam case when it interpreted the law not to include a municipal relicensing preference applicable against the existing licensee. Public power interests have appealed that decision. A decision at the circuit court level is expected this year. The losing side will undoubtedly seek review by the U.S. Supreme Court. Therefore unless Congress decides this issue now on a public policy basis, it is more than likely that the Supreme Court will at some point in the future be interpreting what our predecessors had in mind 65 years ago.

We, as a nation, have long passed the infancy stage of hydroelectric development. Since the 1930's private, investor-owned utilities have been heavily regulated by the States and the Federal Government. Contrary to the fears of the 1920 Congress, these private utilities did not monopolize the Nation's waterways as had been originally feared. Instead, they turned out to be the entities that serve most of the consumers of the Nation with electric power. I therefore believe the issue of preference on relicensing is an important consumer issue which Congress should decide given today's and tomorrow's prevailing economic conditions and changed public needs.

The public policy question which the 99th Congress must resolve is easily stated. It is simply whether or not we want to divest an existing licensee seeking a successor license of the plant and facilities built and paid for by the ratepayers of that licensee by transfering the license to a competing municipal applicant simply because of the status of that applicant, and nothing more. I believe that equity, along with changed times and circumstances, demands a revision of the Federal Power Act along the lines proposed by my bill.

Existing license holders may be private, investor-owned utilities, public, State or municipal utilities, rural electric cooperatives, private companies, or small entrepreneurs such as paper and aluminum enterprises which Congress has encouraged through PURPA and tax incentives to build small hydro projects.

When the time comes for these existing licensees to apply for a new license, they will have constructed, developed and maintained these projects for up to 50 years. In other words, in addition to having their customers benefit from the low cost hydroresources under Federal license, they will have been stewards of these federally regulated water resources in accordance with public interest standards in the law and incorporated in licenses issued by FERC.

I therefore believe that in a relicensing situation if an existing license holder has had an effective track record during the original license term, and demonstrates in its application for a new license and in FERC proceedings that it would continue to have the best adapted project as measured against the law's requirements and all competing applications, that it should receive a new license. In other words if there is any weight to be given in a relicense situation it should be to the existing licensee who took the risk and built the project in the first place.

In my view the optimal result for the public and the resource is achieved when the regulatory agency is required to make a decision on the merits based on public interest standards in the law and an opportunity exists for a competitor to show its plans are better than those of the existing licensee.

We would do a disservice to the public to shift an expiring license to a competitor municipal utility simply because of the Government ownership status of the utility, and nothing more.

It simply doesn't make sense to me to support a concept of preference in relicensing situations that allows one class of consumers served by private investor utilities to be discriminated against to favor another class of electric power customers who happen to live within the borders of a municipality. There is no net benefit to the public at large by applying a policy of preference in relicensing proceedings as there might be with the preference given to States and municipalities in the purchase of federally marketed power, or in initial license situations. Nor can it be said that such licenses would be forever lost to acquisition by municipal utilities. If municipalities have a real need for the facilities represented by the license they can use other provisions of the Federal Power Act to condemn them. In such situations the municipality must pay just compensation to the existing licensee.

Mr. President, let me suggest to you why the arguments advanced by those supporting preferential treatment for public entities in relicense proceedings don't hold water, or establish a public policy worth supporting.

Public power advocates argue that when original licenses expire, the physical assets should be turned over to public utilities in order that the water resources may be used for the benefit of the public.

The only conclusion which can be drawn from this position is that the approximately 73 million ultimate consumers of investor-owned utilities are not members of the public. Nor are the 9.5 million customers of rural electric cooperatives which have no licensing preference, or beneficiaries of private nonutility licensees included among the public.

But in the hands of Government-owned utilities, their advocates argue, 12.8 million customers will receive the benefits of federally regulated hydroelectric power without it passing through the tollgate of investor-owned utilities. In 1920 it was true that large investor-owned utilities had characteristics of natural monopolies which were capable of controlling most of the hydroelectric development in the country. By 1935, both the States and Federal Government stepped in to change dramatically the future of hydroelectric development in this country. The small private holding companies that had once characterized investor-owned utilities in the 1920's were broken up by Congress in the 1930's. Subsequently, State public utility commissions were established to regulate the rates of private utilities.

Today, every private utility's retail electric rates are subjected to comprehensive State regulatory control. Rarely is a private utility's request to increase its electric rate approved without substantial reductions. And, even then commissions only authorize a specified rate of return. A rate of return is by no means guaranteed under this system, and more often than not, the authorized return is not actually achieved. On the other hand, with but few exceptions, municipal utilities' electric rates are not subject to regulatory review. Therefore not only do private investor owned utilities serve the public that comprises their service area, but they are obliged to provide these customers with firm power to meet their needs even if the private investor-owned utility is unsuccessful in getting its FERC license renewed.

But the claim that a municipal preference in relicense situations is merely the device to return to the public domain a public asset or resource that was temporarily assigned to an original licensee for private use is a spurious argument in 1984, at best. Moreover, this claim erroneously characterizes the nature of the Federal interest involved in these projects.

The language of section 4(e) of the Federal Power Act demonstrates that Congress recognized that the Federal interest in hydroprojects is based only on ownership of public lands or Congress' power to regulate navigable streams as part of interstate or foreign commerce. The Federal Government has no proprietary stake whatever in the navigable waters in this Nation. The Federal Government's only cognizable interest is strictly regulatory.

Nor are the project works of the existing licensee and the lands and flowage easements acquired by its public resources. Rather, these are private assets or resources devoted to public service. If Federal lands are used in a project, annual charges or rentals are paid on these lands under section 10(e) of the act by private licensees. Except for the States rights in the streambed, many of the projects which could be taken from existing licensees by application of a preference at relicensing are composed entirely of property interests assembled by developers with investment capital. Congress' commerce clause power to regulate and improve navigation subjects all works that could impede navigation to a dominant servitude for such Federal purposes as may be related to the proper exercise of that power. However, the servitude does not divest title from the owner of subjected property or create sua sponte a proprietary interest in the Federal Government.

Let me make a few other points about the arguments used by proponents of a municipal preference which I believe are inapplicable in this instance.

Advocates of the municipal preference in relicense proceedings argue that the preference is needed to allow municipal utilities to remain viable and to serve as yardsticks by which to judge the effectiveness of private utilities. They assert that they better serve the needs of the public because they are municipalities.

I, quite frankly, find it hard to understand this statement. As we know, States and municipalities and their customers already enjoy significant special privileges where power from navigable waterways is concerned. Their preference for power marketed from Federal hydroelectric projects has given their customers, who represent fewer than 14 percent of the electric customers in the country, access to 68.4 percent of the hydroelectric capacity in the country. With this amount of inexpensive hydropower available to them, they should certainly be viable without having to take existing projects away from those who developed and paid for them.

A recent economic analysis published in Public Utilities Fortnightly by two MIT professors shows that the value of existing facilities will be maximized by spreading the benefits widely and not concentrating them where the price of electricity is already well below the social marginal cost. "Adversary Hydro Relicensing Applications: Using Economic Efficiency Criteria," Public Utilities Fortnightly, December 20, 1984. Since Municipal utility rates are generally far lower than their neighboring regulated investor-owned utilities, I wonder as a matter of policy of the prudence of following a policy of preference at relicensing which would further concentrate even more low-cost hydroelectric power in municipal utilities to the detriment of the far larger segment of the public served by regulated investor-owned utilities.

Clearly, the public interest is much broader today, and it will be even broader still in the future than it was in 1920. Sixty-five years down the road from the time the Federal Power Act was initially passed I think it is time that Congress considered the preference at relicensing issue in light of the many changes that have taken place since then. When you consider the regulation of investor-owned utilities by the States, the shift from the private to the public sector in water power development, the development of all the best hydrosites in the Nation, the requirements for costly environmental controls, and the rampant inflation which has taken place in the decades since 1920 until just recently, it becomes clear that an existing licensee's request for a new license should be judged against the best adapted public interest standards in the law. Preference for a municipality based on status alone in a relicense proceeding simply is not in the present public interest.

The public interest today includes conservation and supply; the need to keep inflation under control; the potential disruption of a firm energy supply to millions of citizens being served by power in use under a FERC license; and the economic impact of a shift of that license to a competitor in a relicense situation. As a bottom line, it includes equity for the ratepayers. They are the power consumers, and they are the public.

The issue here is one of equity and fundamental fairness. A clarification of the law is needed to make relicense proceedings reflect today's times and today's needs.

The issue of equitable compensation if a license isn't renewed must also be addressed. As I indicated earlier, my legislation changes the compensation standard in the law. It would replace the law's net investment standard with a provision calling for just compensation. I know that the merit of doing this as part of the preference on relicensing issue is being questioned by some of my colleagues in the Senate, like Senator JOHNSTON, who did not include compensation language in his bill last session.

However, I believe a change in the compensation standard is an integral and necessary element of a complete legislative proposal on this issue.

As FERC said in the Merwin case, "The preference controversy is bottomed on the bargain cost-based—rather than value-related—price embodied in the 'net investment' concept."

Net investment seemed appropriate in 1920 when inflation was cyclical and temporary, usually followed by deflation. However, as the Commission in Merwin pointed out, "The Members of Congress in 1920 could not have foreseen the near constant inflation spanning the half-century following 1933 that has placed such great dollar values on privately owned hydroelectric properties and made them such bargains at cost-based relicensing prices."

Given the enormous windfall involved in the net investment price, which is the price of original construction more than 50 years ago, less depreciation and severance damages, the incentive to compete for a license in a renewal situation is not based so much on need as it is on greed. Let me explain what I mean.

The Administrative Law Judge's initial decision in the Merwin dam case reveals that under the net investment standards as defined in the act, the existing licensee would only have received $9.4 million for its project. The existing licensee argued that the 1988 present value replacement or alternative power cost would be $832.4 million. The FERC staff, on the other hand, calculated a 1988 present value for future power costs from a replacement thermal plant of $731.7 million.

The point is that whether you take the FERC staff calculation or that of the existing licensee, the difference between the true present day value of the hydro facilities and their original cost is tremendous. Who gets hurt? The ratepayers of the regulated investor-owned utility. Why do they get hurt? They get hurt because the investor-owned utility losing the license is required by law to serve its customers. The customers don't go with the license, only the facilities which the ratepayers of the losing existing licensee built and paid for are transferred under the license. Therefore, an economic windfall goes to the winning competitor.

If that competitor is a municipal applicant asserting "preference" at relicensing, given the fact that the cost-based net investment standard in the current law is such a bargain, it allows municipal competitors to compete using existing licensee's customers' money. In other words, in a relicense situation where the artificial and antiquated net investment standard is left unamended by Congress, the very promise of the windfall of the actual value of the facility versus its original "net investment" costs allows municipal competitors to spend enormous sums for improvements that may or may not be of any use. These proposed changes would all be paid for out of the actual present day value of the licensed facilities.

If there were a good public policy reason for keeping the takeover payment at the 1920 cost of building hydroelectric facilities, instead of repayment for these facilities at a fair price, I might be persuaded to drop the compensation provision from my bill. However, I have heard all the arguments and yet I remain convinced that doing nothing with the compensation provisions upon the recapture of a facility in a relicense proceeding only exacerbates the problems of fundamental fairness facing us with the whole preference on relicensing issue.

Part of the reason is that a private licensee takes over a municipal project in a relicense proceeding, it must pay the value related price of just compensation for these facilities. Therefore the current act already has a dual standard built into it. If a private investor utility loses its license in a renewal proceeding, it would get only its original cost, less depreciation and severance damages. That's simply not fair.

Nor is it fair to assert, as municipal utilities do, that the customers of investor-owned utilities don't "deserve" a just compensation price because they knew they might lose the license at the end of the term when the license was first given. If that is the case, I wonder why the Federal Power Act was amended in the 1950's to provide that municipal entities receive "just compensation" if they lose their FERC licenses at relicensing. Is not what is good for the goose good for the gander?

If you take this legal theory to its logical end that the present day actual value of a license reverts to the licensor, which is in this case the Federal Government, then I don't see how or why a third party beneficiary new licensee is entitled to reap the windfall of a power to regulate navigable waterways given to the Federal Government by the commerce clause of the Constitution. The fact is that the licensing relationship is between the United States and the licensee. Third parties like municipal utilities are both strangers to the relationship and, at best, gratuitous beneficiaries of the act's pricing arrangements.

My bill would not in any way affect the Government's ability to itself take over a project under section 14 of the act and to pay only net investment for such a takeover. The just compensation provision operates only where some third party seeks to seize the benefits created by the current licensee and their customers.

The standard of "just compensation" in my bill is derived from the Constitution of the United States. It is precisely the language now used in section 14(a) of the Federal Power Act concerning compensation to be paid in a condemnation proceeding. Nothing more or less will do in a relicense proceeding. This is the case because the public in general receives no net benefit from the transfer of the license, and no Federal right is being violated or impaired. Therefore, fundamental fairness requires a revision of the compensation standard by third party takers of a license of just compensation. Anything less will substantially raise utility rates across-a-broad spectrum of the consuming public served by the losing licensee. That, in turn, will adversely impact on our present national policies to conserve energy and to make maximum benefit of our energy resources to the broadest segment of the public possible.

The Federal Power Act was originally founded on the dual principles of economic development and the Nation's water resources and its conservation. As we move with increasing speed to close out the chapters of the 20th century, let us do so with prudence and optimism. Conservation, both in water resource and in energy terms must be the watchword. Economic impacts of the transfers of power in use from one licensee to another and the ratepayers served by these competitors must be assessed in relicense proceedings. We have now, as we did not in 1920, a broad public interest to serve if we are to move this Nation to meet the challenges of the future.

Challenge sometimes means there is a need for change. In this particular case, I believe it is necessary for Congress to state clearly that no preference exists in relicensing. However, in so doing, I want to make one thing crystal clear. This legislation is not an attack on a State's or municipality's entitlement to preference in federally marketed power or in relicense situations. This bill is narrowly framed to obtain a narrow result. It is simply a call for equity in relicensing proceedings given today's energy and consumer needs.

Mr. President, in closing I would like to submit as part of the RECORD for use by my colleagues in the Senate and others who are interested in this subject some statistics. I have asked the Edison Electric Institute to run the current numbers on the hydroelectric projects currently under FERC license by State. I believe my colleagues will find this information useful.

In addition, I am advised by the Edison Electric Institute that presently, 177 FERC licenses held by investor-owned utilities will expire by December 31, 1993. These 177 projects represent 48 percent of the total number of projects licensed to investor-owned utilities.

To put this in perspective, although investor-owned utilities operate only 32 percent of the Nation's total hydroelectric installed capacity, they serve 76 percent of the Nation's ultimate customers. By comparison, public utilities, municipal and State projects serve approximately 13 percent of the Nation's ultimate customers, and they operate or have priority access to 68 percent of the Nation's total hydroelectric capacity, including Federal projects.

Home is where the heart is, Mr. President. Last, but not least, in my own home State of Wyoming regulated investor-owned utilities serve 112,699 customers. The rural electric cooperatives, which serve another important segment of the State's citizens with firm electric power, support the legislative initiative which I am proposing today. I would liked to commend them for their firm stance on an issue of importance to all consumers in the Nation. If this legislation is enacted it would protect all existing licensees equally. Equity is what this bill is all about.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and other supporting material be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 7(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 800(a)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "original" after "hereunder or"; and

(2) by striking out "and in issuing licenses to new licensees under section 15 hereof".

SEC. 3. Section 15(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 808(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "is authorized to" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall";

(2) by striking out "original" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "existing";

(3) by striking out "regulations, or" and inserting in lieu thereof "regulations unless the Commission determines, taking into account public benefits provided during the preceding license term, that such licensee's project or projects, as described in its application for a new license, will not meet the licensing standards set forth in section 10(a). If the Commission determines that the project or projects do not meet such standards, it is authorized"; and

(4) by striking out "such amount" and inserting in lieu thereof "just compensation in an amount that the Commission shall determine in accordance with due process of law,"; and by striking the comma after the words "to do".

[2] Annual fuel costs for equivalent generation are expressed in 1983 dollars and are determined by using 1983 company prices for replacement fuel; the calculations do not take into account future fuel costs or normalized water conditions. Calculations were made using the formula shown in Appendix A. Company-specific fuel cost figures as shown in "The Cost and Quality of Fuels for Electric Utility Plants." (DOE/EIA-091, 1983) are used.

APPENDICES

APPENDIX A

Average annual hydro generation can be expressed in terms of the cost of "equivalent barrels of oil." The national average transformation number of 576 kWh per barrel of oil can be used with company-specific oil costs per barrel.

Step 1: 148,452 (avg. Btu per gal of oil) × 42 gal. per bbl = 6,234,984 Btu per bbl ÷ 10,831 (avg. Btu per kWh) = 576 kWh per bbl.

Step 2: The utility's 1983 hydro generation ÷ 576 kWh/bbl oil × the utility's cost per bbl = equivalent oil fuel savings.

A comparable calculation can be made using coal. The national average transformation number of 2,015 kWh per ton of coal can be used with company-specific coal costs per ton.

Step 1: 10,517 (avg. Btu per lb. coal) × 2,000 lb. per ton = 21,034,000 Btu per ton coal ÷ 10,438 (avg. Btu per kWh) = 2,015 kWh per ton.

Step 2: The utility's 1983 hydro generation ÷ 2,015 kWh/ton coal × the utility's cost per ton = equivalent coal fuel savings.

The source for the figures in each Step 1 of the above calculations is the EEI 1983 Statistics of Fuel Used to Generate Electricity by the Electric Utility Industry.

The source for the company-specific delivered price per barrel of oil and ton of coal is The Cost and Quality of Fuels for Electric Utility Plants (DOE/EIA-0191, 1983).

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator WALLOP, in sponsoring the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985. This legislation provides the much-needed reforms to the Federal Power Act of 1920.

Under the Federal Power Act of 1920, the Federal Power Commission, now the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, is empowered to issue licenses for the construction and operation of hydroelectric projects on the Nation's navigable rivers. By 1993, 177 existing hydroelectric projects will require relicensing. The act does not clearly state whether public utilities have preferential rights to the power in relicensing.

The Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985 eliminates this confusion by making it clear that the preference clause of section 7 of the Federal Power Act does not apply in the case of relicensing. This bill insures that the customers of hydroelectric projects would continue to receive benefits of low-cost electricity, providing the existing licensee can meet the standards embraced in section 10(a) of the act. Without this amendment, a hydroelectric project could be transferred from millions of customers served by a regulated, investor-owned utility to the relatively few customers of a municipality.

This bill also eliminates the potential injustice of the compensation clause. Under the current law, the existing licensee is entitled net investment plus severance damages from a successful relicensing contestant. Given the age of most facilities, the net investment value represents quite a bargain in comparison to a fair market value. This bill ensures the existing licensee receives "just compensation" if the project is licensed to a different licensee.

In the interest of equity, it is important to amend the Federal Power Act as proposed. These amendments will eliminate confusion surrounding the preference issue and serve to protect millions of consumers across the Nation who are being served by regulated investor-owned utilities.

I hope the Senate can act on this important measure in the very near future, and I urge my colleagues to join in this effort.●

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Wyoming in sponsoring the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985. I applaud the initiative which Senator WALLOP has taken in drafting this legislation. I am convinced that the provisions of this bill will, as its title indicates, best protect the interest of the majority of electric consumers both in California and throughout the Nation.

In supporting this legislation, I am joined by literally hundreds of organizations from across the Nation which recognize the need to clarify ambiguities in the Federal Power Act of 1920. These ambiguities jeopardize the interests of the vast majority of consumers who receive their power from investor owned utilities.

The need for this legislation has been demonstrated by recent decisions of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and by continuing litigation which surrounds this issue. Because some 177 existing hydroelectric projects will face relicensing hearings in the next 10 years, it is clear that Congress must act and must act now to clarify its intent on this matter.

Mr. President, the provisions of this bill are simple. First and foremost it provides that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission shall issue a new license to the existing licensee upon application unless the Commission determines that the project will not meet the standards prescribed in the 1920 act, or the Federal Government wishes to take over the project pursuant to provisions in section 14 of the act.

I need not explain to members of the Energy Committee, and certainly not to my colleague, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Lands and Reserved Water, the importance of preserving capital investments made by electric utilities. The difficulty of forecasting future energy needs and facility requirements has been made even more difficult in the last decade by rapidly changing energy prices, new environmental requirements, and changing consumption and production habits.

This legislation attempts to insure that those utilities which have in the past assumed the risk of developing hydroelectric facilities should continue to benefit, on behalf of their customers and stockholders, from these projects. I can think of no principle more fundamental to our free market system than this.

Mr. Chairman, I do not speak alone in support of this legislation. I am joined by members of California Public Utilities Commission, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Business Roundtable, the American Farm Bureau and the American Association of Retired Persons among others. The diversity of interests which have united behind this legislation is, I believe clear evidence of the need for its adoption.

There are, I fully understand, entities and individuals who oppose this legislation. I can understand their position and have read their proposals to change the 1920 act in ways which they sincerely believe would strengthen our relicensing process.

While I am familiar with their position, I cannot say that I am in support of their proposal. I note that they do attempt to address compensation issues, which I might add are woefully in need of attention. It leaves in place, however, the preference which I believe is really the fundamental question before us today.

In weighing the options which have been presented, it is imperative that the interests of all consumers be made primary in our considerations. As the Oakland Tribune concluded many months ago in an editorial on this subject, "if public interest is the best, it should be clear that keeping electricity rates low for all northern Californians better meets the public interest test."

Mr. Chairman, the issue at hand is how best to distribute a resource whose value has only recently become fully known to us: inexpensive power. Because rivers, a public resource are involved in producing this power, it is of particular importance that the greatest number of citizens possible enjoy the benefits of this resource. The Electric Consumers Protection Act achieves this objective, insuring that the 75 percent of Californians who are served by investor-owned utilities can continue to have access to the important hydro resources of our State.

Mr. Chairman, it is my hope that this legislation will receive the timely consideration of the Energy Committee. I sincerely hope that we can soon report to utility users across the Nation that this important matter has been resolved in favor of preserving service to the greatest number of utility consumers.●

By Mr. SYMMS:

S. 428. A bill to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937 to provide additional homeownership and resident management opportunities for families residing in public housing projects; to the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

HOMESTEAD ACT OF 1985

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on September 27, 1984, we held the fourth in a series of hearings on privatization before the Joint Economic Committee's Subcommittee on Monetary and Fiscal Policy.

Privatization is the transfer of the ownership of assets and, consequently, the responsibility for supplying goods and services from the public to the private sector of the economy.

At that time we addressed the privatization of public housing. I was particularly pleased that Congressman KEMP was our first witness because privatization of public housing is not only a privatization issue, but it is also a supply-side issue, one that is of importance to the future health of our Nation's cities.

Government intervention has driven a wedge between the demand for and supply of housing in this country. As a result, these Government policies have actually worked on the supply side of the housing market to either destroy our Nation's housing stock or retard its growth. Prof. Peter Salins has documented how these negative supply-side effects have worked in New York City. For evidence, allow me to suggest that you refer to Salins' book, "The Ecology of Housing Destruction."

By privatizing public housing, I believe we can begin to remove some of the supply-side impediments to the provision of housing for the needy.

We began those hearings with Congressman KEMP's analysis of the privatization option for the United States, and then heard from Dr. Stuart Butler, who reviewed how Britain's privatization program for public housing has worked.

I encourage my colleagues and their staff to look at this testimony, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, along with the Heritage Foundation material entitled "Public Housing: From Tenants to Homeowners."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE URBAN HOMESTEAD ACT OF 1984: A PLAN FOR TURNING TENANTS INTO HOMEOWNERS

(Testimony before the Joint Economic Committee by Congressman Jack Kemp, September 27, 1984)

I welcome the opportunity to testify today on the Urban Homestead Act, a new bill which I have just introduced along with some of my colleagues, which extends homeownership opportunities to thousands of public housing tenants who yearn to own their own home. I would like to recognize the important contributions and efforts in this regard of Heritage Foundation's Stuart Butler, American Enterprise Institute's Cicero Wilson, Bob Woodson of the Center for Neighborhood Enterprise, Dr. June Q. Koch, Assistant Secretary for Policy Development and Research at HUD, and the many others who have provided important assistance and advice on my bill.

In all our efforts, we have striven to achieve one major goal: to make the dream of homeownership a reality for thousands of public housing tenants—often poor, black, and on welfare—who don't have a strong voice in Washington, who feel left out of our economic system, and who have often become alienated from our political system.

We want to let these people know that their aspirations, their hopes, and their dreams are our own. That the American dream of homeownership is not just for the well-to-do, or even the middle class, but also for poor people who live in the most blighted areas of our inner cities. They too yearn for homeownership—a home they can afford, a home in which to raise a family in security and independence, a home in which to take pride while building and improving for the future and for their children.

Yet today most of the urban poor find it nearly impossible to own their own home. Not just because their income is low, interest rates high, and their credit worthiness doubtful, but also because tenants in government housing projects are not permitted to purchase their dwellings. We don't want to eliminate public housing or cripple its effectiveness. While there certainly are some bad housing projects, our goal is to enhance and improve this tremendous national asset by allowing public housing tenants the opportunity to buy their own home.

All of this is not to say that the public housing is trouble free. Far from it. Public housing discourages work and saving, raises numerous barriers to the upward mobility of tenants, and sometimes has degenerated into dilapidated and depressing slums.

If a public housing tenant on welfare takes a job, for example, he faces effective marginal tax rates over 100%, due not just to federal, state, and local taxes on his earnings, but also the loss of government support payments as well. As the tenant's income increases, his rent would be raised accordingly. And he could be expelled from the project if his income rises too much. If a tenant marries, the additional income of a spouse may make them ineligible for public housing.

Tenants have little incentive to conserve utilities or properly maintain projects, and public housing authorities have just as little incentive to upgrade projects or fill vacant units, since they get paid whether the unit is vacant or filled. What a tragedy that over 60,000 public housing units lay vacant, while thousands of the poor are on waiting lists for an apartment.

I believe that homeownership can lift the aspirations, hopes, and self-respect of those in our inner city slums. When people become homeowners something dramatic occurs in their attitudes, character, and outlook. Families acquire new dignity, they begin to take pride in what they own, and they become more steadfast and concerned citizens in the community.

The mere act of homeownership transforms tenants, giving them a new sense of belonging and self-reliance. Homeownership encourages stable and intact families, creates a longer outlook on life and the future, and gives the poor new reasons to work and save. Homeownership can help give new life to the inner city poor by promoting human dignity, personal achievement, and social stability.

And in doing so, America itself gains in strength. Since the beginning of our country, tenantry has been viewed as unfavorable to freedom. The policy of free republics was always to multiply homeownership to increase the love of country, the spirit of independence, and self-reliance. Abraham Lincoln over a century ago endorsed a Homestead Act which opened up the Western frontier to the new immigrants and freed blacks seeking to own their own home. We name our bill in honor of Lincoln's Homestead Act since we share his objective of homeownership for all regardless of income, creed, or race.

Can it be done? Can poor people become the owners of their own homes? Many say no, that the economics of the poor preclude homeownership for all but the middle class.

I believe that many tenants would choose homeownership, if they were given a choice. Our inner city poor are our country's most important untapped resource. We can turn many of the poor into homeowners, if only we have the determination and imagination to make this goal a reality.

We already have tested and demonstrated examples of successful tenant-management of public housing like Ms. Kimi Gray of Kenilworth/Parkside Gardens who modernized a dilapidated project, improved maintenance, and reduced costs to a point where the project is now self-sustaining. But what she really did was to lift the spirits and sights of her tenants. And the results were dramatic reductions in many social problems like crime, drug abuse, and vandalism. She and her tenants deserve to be homeowners.

This story is repeated in the charismatic leadership of other tenant managers, like Ms. Bertha Gilkey of Cochran Gardens in St. Louis, or Ms. Bonnie Downs of Iroquois Homes in Louisville, Kentucky, or Ms. Viney Reynolds of B.W. Cooper Homes in Louisiana—all of whom have helped turn some of the worst housing projects into showcase success stories. These tenants and others have demonstrated that they can handle the full responsibilities and privileges of homeownership.

I am proposing a determined national effort to build on the efforts and aspirations of the Kimi Grays and Viney Reynoldes to make private ownership the next reasonable and viable step for tenant-managed projects. We don't make homeownership an entitlement program. Giving away housing without requiring any stake by the tenant himself would defeat our purpose of promoting independence and pride among tenants. It would also be an affront to low and middle income Americans who must work hard to afford their own homes.

Our bill puts homeownership in striking distance for deserving tenants who have demonstrated that they can handle the responsibilities and costs of homeownership.

The premises and details of our plan, which is only a beginning step, would proceed along the following line: First, tenants would form a tenant association; second, they would be trained and educated to efficiently manage their projects; third, they could buy the project at a discount from market value after demonstrating that they could bear the costs and responsibilities of ownership and project management.

Our first premise is that tenants themselves would show their interest and support for homeownership by forming a homeowners association with intention to buy. The homeowners association, not HUD or the local public housing authority, would initiate and plot the course for eventual conversion of the projects to homeownership. Our approach does not bypass the housing bureaucracy but neither does it allow public housing authorities to arbitrarily block homeownership.

Our responsibility, however, doesn't end with putting a "for sale" sign on government housing projects. We must go much farther. My bill envisions a partnership involving labor, business, local housing authorities, civic organizations, foundations, and especially poor people themselves, to make the dream of homeownership a reality. Aspiring homeowners must be trained, educated, and counseled not just on managing the responsibilities of home ownership, but also on job skills, financial management, and home care maintenance. Is this asking too much? The experience of tenant-managed projects gives a resounding no.

Public housing projects can also become the focal point for many self-help efforts like the Administration's Job Training Partnership Act and its Enterprise Zone legislation which promote job skills, enterprise, and new business to greenline distressed inner cities which too often have been blacklined against private enterprise and growth. Local civic groups like Rev. Leon Sullivan's Opportunities Industrialization Center, which has done outstanding work in training rehabilitation experts from the ranks of the unskilled, should also be tapped.

We have already received encouraging support from real estate associations, life insurance firms, foundations, and businesses ready to contribute training, management and technical expertise, and even seed capital. Local governments could provide tax abatement. In short, our homeownership initiative is more than just signing papers, it is an entire urban revitilization strategy around the inner city family's most cherished possession: its home.

Our second premise is that public housing must be sold at large discounts, since obviously most tenants are quite poor. To help facilitate what is beyond the means of most poor, a homeowners association could purchase their dwelling at no more than 25 percent of market value and no down payment. The public housing authority would "take back" a mortgage at reasonable rates (no more than 70 percent of market interest rates). To bring homeownership into the reach of even more poor people, tenants themselves could build equity in their homes by contributing their own talents and labor as part of their investment.

Third, to protect all public housing tenants, our bill provides a number of important safeguards both for tenants and the homeowners. Tenants who don't choose to buy either would continue to rent as now from the public housing authority or would receive a housing voucher from the government equal to or better than their current housing assistance. No tenants could ever lose their home as a consequence of our bill.

To prevent premature or hasty transfer of ownership, title would be transferred to tenants only after HUD certifies that they and the homeowners association can afford the cost and responsibilities of homeownership. Under our bill, the Department of Housing and Urban Development must bring the housing up to decent standards before being sold and would provide continuing assistance as needed even after conversion to private ownership.

Taxpayers also gain from the Urban Homestead Act. Aside from construction costs, taxpayers now pay over $3 billion yearly in operating and modernizing subsidies for public housing, about $2,100 per unit a year. Many public housing projects can achieve economic self-sufficiency and can operate on a break even basis without government subsidies. The payoff is not only reduced government subsidies, but significantly higher property values for businesses and taxpayers in neighborhoods near public housing projects.

Now, this is a sketchy outline of our plan. Clearly, this involves a great many issues and raises a number of problems. But nothing in this plan has not been done before on a smaller scale and has not been already tested and tried with success. What is really new is our strong determination to make homeownership available to low-income families in America's cities. Considering the greater security and peace of mind, the tremendous boost in morale and dignity, and the opportunity to rebuild our inner cities, shouldn't we be looking at ways to turn tenants into homeowners? There is no more rewarding investment than helping some of America's urban poor realize an important and lasting stake in the American dream.

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICY SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE, SEPTEMBER 27, 1984

(By Stuart M. Butler, Director of Domestic Policy Studies, The Heritage Foundation)

My name is Stuart Butler. I am Director of Domestic Policy Studies at The Heritage Foundation. The views I put forward are my own, and should not be taken as representing any official position of the Foundation.

I have taken a keen interest in the idea of privatization for some time, and a number of articles by myself and other authors on the issue have been published by Heritage during the last three years. These have dealt with a wide variety of issues from the privatization standpoint, including Social Security, municipal services, bank deposit insurance, and, most recently, public housing. My interest in the idea of privatizing public housing stemmed from the work of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise, and from the experience of a privatization model in Britain.

The National Center has examined the role of neighborhood-based organizations in service delivery and economic development within low income communities. The Center found that when groups are given control of functions, they can be remarkably successful in bringing down costs and developing innovative and highly effective methods of dealing with local problems.

Housing is a case in point. In conjunction with the Project on Neighborhood Revitalization of the American Enterprise Institute, the National Center has examined the performance of community-based management organizations as operators of public housing—Kimi Gray, the Resident Manager of such a corporation in Washington, will be testifying before the subcommittee tomorrow. The data concerning these corporations will be discussed during Ms. Gray's testimony, but the general conclusion is that dramatic cost reductions can be achieved once tenants obtain control of their own destiny. Ownership is the logical next step after tenant management. Ownership provides a clear stake in the community—one that is permanent. The evidence from both the United States and Britain is that once low income people acquire ownership rights over their homes, they take a very different view towards maintenance, economic improvement, and even social problems within their community.

It is this change in attitudes and commitment that lies at the heart of the privatization strategy. Privatization has nothing to do with "selling off" valuable federal assets to private interests: it has everything to do with using a change of ownership to alter behavior patterns, thereby stimulating efficiency, innovation, and a determination to preserve and improve the asset. The proposal to encourage homeownership among public housing tenants is an excellent example of this strategy. By providing residents with an ownership stake in their communities, the program would enable low income people to attain the American dream of home ownership, reduce the burden on the federal government of excessive operating costs, and stimulate community efforts to tackle the social problems that now lead to falling property values, vandalism and boarded-up dwellings.

Following is an analysis of the British "Right to Buy" program, which has turned 500,000 tenants into homeowners, together with the framework of a plan for a similar program in the United States. While there may be disagreement on the details of such a homeownership plan, there can be little doubt that the ownership idea works in low income neighborhoods. The demonstration program being developed by HUD is a major step forward in turning ownership into a reality in such neighborhoods. I hope that Congress will study that program carefully, while preparing the legislation necessary to turn the experiment into a full program.

PUBLIC HOUSING: FROM TENANTS TO HOMEOWNERS

(By Stuart M. Butler, Director of Domestic Policy Studies)

INTRODUCTION

Public housing projects in the United States have come to epitomize urban blight. While this view is exaggerated, it is nevertheless true that public housing represents one of the great ironies of federal intervention. When the program began in the 1930s, the assumption was that the projects would help ameliorate social problems in the cities by stabilizing communities and the housing stock. The reverse has been true.

Yet there is evidence, in this country and abroad, that certain inner city housing experiments can have positive results. They all have one thing in common—ownership. Whether the program is homesteading, where abandoned properties can be brought for a dollar, or the discounted sale of public housing to tenants (in Britain), the effect is the same. When residents acquire an equity stake in the future of their building, and hence their neighborhood, they gain incentives to change their behavior from destructive to constructive and to urge their neighbors to do likewise. And instead of economic improvement bringing with it the threat of increased land values and displacement, equity allows a resident to rise with the tide—not drown in it.

But, some would argue, the low income of public housing tenants precludes their becoming homeowners. The solution to this apparent barrier is to recognize that support for homeownership is entrenched in the tax codes. Thanks to the mortgage interest deduction, middle- and upper-income Americans have powerful tax incentives to become homeowners. This is no accident. The explicit purpose of the deduction is to help Americans purchase homes. Yet the low-income tenant, who pays little or no income tax, has no such incentive—so he must pay a far higher after-tax price than higher-income citizens buying exactly the same property.

Congress and the Administration should recognize this inequity and establish a "Right to Buy" homeownership program in the inner cities, based on the sale of public housing buildings, at a substantial discount, to associations of occupying tenants. The Reagan Administration should establish an experimental program immediately using existing law. It should also seek legislation to permit tenant associations to apply directly to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) for permission to purchase buildings from their local Public Housing Authority (PHA). The legislation should also allow the Secretary to require the PHA to provide the tenant group with a mortgage.

Proponents of such a program would be blind if they overlooked its political advantages. A similar plan in Britain enabled Conservative Margaret Thatcher to make considerable inroads among traditionally Labor-voting public housing tenants in her landslide 1983 reelection. The New York Times noted after the election that:

As political experts and party strategists sift through the results of Labor's crushing defeat . . . more and more are identifying the "homeowner mentality" of voters . . . as a crucial development.[1]

An inner city homeownership plan would extend the idea of owning a home to low-income Americans. It would help stabilize the value of public rental stock near tenant-owned units, and would plant the seeds of improvement in the nations's most desolate neighborhoods. It would be a logical companion to the enterprise zone approach to inner city development. Like the zone proposal, which seeks to unlock the entrepreneurial spirit, the Right to Buy program would draw on the strengths of residents to tackle the problems of their own community.

THE BRITISH RIGHT TO BUY PROGRAM

During the last five years, over 500,000 dwellings (out of a total public housing stock of approximately 7 million units) have been sold to public housing tenants in Britain under the "Right to Buy" scheme. Widening homeownership in this way is seen by the Thatcher government as central to its objective of reviving neighborhoods and encouraging self-improvement.

Stated simply, Britain's Right to Buy program allows public housing tenants to purchase their units at a discount on the market value of up to 60 percent, based on the length of tenancy.

Eligibility

A tenant obtains the right to buy it if he or she has been a public housing tenant for at least two years[2] and the unit is the principal home. The tenant can purchase the unit jointly with up to three other family members, provided they have been living in the same unit for at least three months.

Discount

If the tenant has lived in public housing for three years, the unit can be bought at the market value less 33 percent. The discount increases by 1 percent for each additional year as a tenant, up to a maximum 60 percent discount after 30 years as a tenant.[3]

---

[1] "In Housing Policy, It Seems the Tories Had a Winner," The New York Times, June 22, 1983.

[2] Decreased from three years in legislation passed in 1983.

[3] Prior to the 1983 legislation, the maximum discount was 50 percent after 20 years.

The period counting toward the discount need not have been spent in the same unit, or even within the jurisdiction of the same housing authority. The valuation, upon which the discounted price is based, is calculated by the housing authority. If the tenant disagrees with that valuation, he can appeal to the District Valuer, an independent official whose decision is legally binding on both parties.

Finance

The purchaser has three options in raising the money to pay for the house.

(a) The tenant can obtain a mortgage from a savings and loan association. Approximately half of all public housing sales are financed in this way.

(b) The tenant has the legal right to a mortgage from the local housing authority. Basically the loan amount is limited to 2½ times the annual income of the purchaser, plus 1 times the annual income of any other family members assisting in the purchase. For purchasers over 60 years of age, the multiple is lower.

(c) The tenant may buy the unit in stages. After buying at least 50 percent of the unit, with the usual discount according to length of tenancy, he can obtain full ownership by purchasing increments of 12½ percent. The tenant continues to pay rent on the portion still owned by the housing authority.

Like the purchaser of privately built housing, the public housing tenant-buyer can deduct mortgage interest payments from taxable income. The trouble has been that, if the low-income purchaser pays little or no income tax, the mortgage deduction is practically worthless. Since April 1983, however, a low-income buyer in Britain has been able to utilize the Mortgage Interest Relief at Source Program. Under this, he can obtain a cash subsidy equal to the tax relief to which he is entitled (at the 30 percent lowest bracket), less the amount he can actually deduct from his tax bill—in effect a refundable mortgage deduction.

Value recapture

A tenant-buyer cannot buy his unit one day with a 60 percent discount, sell it the next at the full market rate, and walk away with the difference. If the unit is sold within one year of the initial purchase, 100 percent of the discount must be repaid. This repayment requirement falls by 20 percent each year until, after five years, the unit can be resold without the repayment of any portion of the discount.

ANALYSIS OF THE BRITISH EXPERIENCE

The British program of public housing sales has been highly popular and had profound effects on many neighborhoods. As the program's proponents expected, signs of home improvement activity, close attention to maintenance, and resident involvement in neighborhood issues have become evident in communities where tenants are buying. The reason for this is simple, says Conservative Councilwoman Hazel Weiberg, "ownership gives them a greater stake in the community." [4]

Distribution of housing and sales

Approximately one-third of all housing in Britain is publicly owned rental accommodation. This is above the average for Western Europe, and far above the 1.5 percent in the U.S. In addition, the mean income of families in British public housing is not far below that of owner-occupying families, and it is a shade higher than families in private rental units. One reason for this is that local housing authorities cannot evict tenants whose incomes rise above the initial threshold for their unit. Moreover, the right of tenancy in a public housing unit in Britain can be passed on to an heir who has lived with the tenant. British public housing structures also differ from those found in American cities. While there are many examples of blighted high-rise properties, more typical is the well-built duplex or four-unit walk-up in a reasonably stable neighborhood.

The sales of British public housing reflect these characteristics. Data for 1982, for instance, indicate that the average income of tenant purchasers was only 16 percent lower than that of all first-time house buyers in Britain, and 96 percent of public units sold were town houses, duplexes, or detached houses (only 4 percent were apartments). Nevertheless, sales were more common among lower-income public housing tenants than is usual for first time buyers. Forty-seven percent of public housing purchasers earned less than $10,000 a year (34 percent for all first-time buyers), and 14 percent earned less than $7,000 (9 percent generally).[5] Not surprisingly, in view of the discount based on length of tenancy, the average age of the tenant-buyer (43 years) was significantly above the average for first-time buyers (31).

Multi-unit buildings

The data indicate that the bulk of public housing sales in Britain have constituted purchases of fairly desirable types of housing to tenants who would not be classified as very poor. So American policymakers should not assume that the typical Right to Buy sale involves a welfare mother buying her high-rise apartment.

Indeed, it is the high-rise apartment that has been the most difficult for local authorities to sell to tenants. British officials are quick to point out, however, that a high proportion of Britain's multifamily urban public housing was built after the Second World War with poor material and designs. Inadequate durability and structural problems make these units very unattractive for purchase, even at low prices. Would-be buyers in such buildings are inclined to remain on the waiting list for a more desirable property (using the waiting time toward a larger discount).

A second key factor is the unfamiliarity of the British with mechanism such as tenant management or cooperative ownership. Tenant management is almost unknown in Britain, and cooperative ownership is rare. Consequently, say British officials, tenants have a strong resistance to the only forms of purchase and organization that are practical for low-income people in multifamily buildings. Even when a tenant buys his home in a 4-unit walk-up, the local authority usually retains the responsibility for the common areas and general maintenance (with a service fee), rather than have the owners accept this responsibility.

Lessons of the British model

Despite such differences between the U.K. and U.S. situations, the British program contains important lessons for a workable approach on this side of the Atlantic.

The first is that a discount based on length of tenancy is a powerful stimulus and a means of favoring the most stable tenants. Initial fears that the discounts would provoke anger among working class buyers of private homes (who enjoy no such discount) proved groundless. The discount strategy has enabled many long established tenants to become even firmer anchors in the community.

A second lesson is that the resale value recapture mechanism is an important ingredient of the British program. It discourages rapid resale—which would undermine the otherwise stabilizing features of the program. On the other hand, the prospect of capital gain is important to a purchaser. In neighborhoods where market prices are not rising, or even falling, the sliding scale recapture provision in Britain allows for a potential capital gain within a reasonably short time.

The third lesson is that an American version of the British plan would have to overcome the problem of selling apartments to low-income tenants. Given the familiarity of Americans with cooperative ownership, this should present fewer problems than it has in Britain. Nevertheless, the high concentration of low-income people in American public housing would require more creative financing arrangements than are typical in Britain.

A PROGRAM FOR THE UNITED STATES

Since 1949, Congress has targeted the public housing program increasingly toward lower-income and welfare families, rather than those with modest incomes. Unlike Britain, therefore, the family income of a typical American public housing tenant is well below the national median—posing problems for any sales policy. Legislation does give a Public Housing Authority (PHA) in the United States the power to sell a "low income project to its lower income tenants." The sale price is usually based on the portion of the original development cost still outstanding—not the current market value. So discounted sales are permissible in the U.S.

This and other legislation have led to a number of home ownership programs for low-income tenants. The Turnkey III program, begun in 1968 and terminated in 1973, used the PHA framework to develop housing projects for sale, on a lease-purchase basis, to groups of public housing tenants with sufficient incomes to permit a sale without continued operating subsidies. The price was based on the total original development costs, and if the buyer were to resell the unit within five years of receiving full title, the PHA was entitled to recapture the capital gain according to a sliding scale. A requirement for success was the ability of the buyer to undertake basic maintenance and to accept the financial and other obligations of ownership.

Similar problems arose with the Section 235 Homeownership Program, another major federal initiative to encourage low-income homeownership through the sale of new or extensively rehabilitated units. The income problem was compounded in the case of Section 235 by the low (3 percent) down payment requirement—which could be in the form of "sweat equity" (that is, provided in the form of on-site work rather than cash). This meant that the loan-to-value ratio could easily come to exceed 100 percent in an unstable neighborhood—encouraging others to abandon their properties at the first need for substantial maintenance outlays.

The most extensive and perhaps most interesting low-income ownership program, however, has been the Indian Mutual Help Ownership Opportunity Program, which constitutes 61 percent of HUD assistance in Indian areas. Families or tribes must make a down payment contribution of at least $1,500 toward each unit, in the form of cash, land, or work. The resident can acquire title to the unit, generally after 25 years, through a lease-purchase plan that allows equity to be built up gradually. The program has been very popular and effective, covering over 30,000 units.

[5] Assuming one pound = $1.40.

Mutual housing associations (MHAs), as a homeownership vehicle for public housing tenants, have attracted considerable attention in recent years. Proposals are now being formulated in Paterson, New Jersey, for example, which would use the model to transfer 242 public housing units into tenant ownership. The title of the building first would be transferred to a mutual housing association made up of residents. This MHA would be affiliated to a citywide MHA with a board of directors drawn from city officials and local organizations. This citywide MHA could enlist support and provide technical assistance for would-be buyers, thereby improving the chances of successful ownership by individuals, who would be able to purchase title from the MHA.

THE PRINCIPLES OF A NEW OWNERSHIP INITIATIVE

Drawing on British and American experience in encouraging ownership among low-income tenants, principles for a successful homeownership program for public housing tenants emerge. Among them:

Discounts and equity

It is clear from the problems associated with section 235, and in contrast, the success of the British approach, that buyers must feel they have sufficient stake in their homes to justify expenditures on maintenance. Discounting the price (giving the prospect of a substantial capital gain) would provide that stake indirectly but effectively: a token down payment does not.

Current law permits HUD to sell to a resident tenant at a discount with the federal government paying off part or all of the existing capital debt. Similarly, units can be modernized without the tenant-buyer being required to pay the cost of modernization.

A subsidy to buyers

Some critics of discounted sales to low-income buyers charge that this constitutes an unfair valuable subsidy to the buyer. These critics overlook the mortgage deduction available to middle- and upper-income buyers—which is of little value to low income buyers. If the purpose of Treasury assistance is to help home-buyers, then a price discount on public housing would be a rational and equitable device to help low-income buyers. Depending on the discount chosen and the tax savings (if any) usable by purchase, a case could also be made—again on equity grounds—for some interest relief for low-income buyers. It would be reasonable for the interest payable on PHA-provided mortgages to be reduced by an amount at least equal to the lowest marginal federal tax rate.

Netting for other subsidies

Subsidy calculations should also be adjusted for the subsidies to other groups already included in the cost of public housing. American Enterprise Institute scholar John Weicher notes that studies suggest that new public housing units cost about 25 percent more than comparable private housing. The major reasons for this are the high tax revenue costs associated with tax-exempt financing often used in such projects (a subsidy to higher-income investors) and high construction costs due to the application of the Davis-Bacon Act (a subsidy to construction workers).[6] There seems little justice in forcing low-income homebuyers to cover the capital cost of a subsidy to Americans earning well above their income. The cash basis for any calculation of purchase price, therefore, should net out such subsidies.

Developing homeowner attitudes

A major problem associated with low-income buyers, even if financing can be arranged, is that they often lack the maintenance and accounting skills needed for homeownership. On the other hand, some remarkable successes have been achieved with tenant management associations as vehicles to encourage sound maintenance techniques—especially when cash incentives were utilized. As head of Newark's public housing in the 1970s, for instance, Tom Massaro sought to cut costs by inviting tenants to take over many responsibilities. For every dollar this saved the city, the tenants were allowed a portion to finance community activities. The result: vandalism and utility costs plummeted and tenants acquired useful maintenance skills.

Another tenant management association in Kenilworth Courts, Washington, D.C., has achieved dramatic cost reductions by training its own tenants in management and maintenance skills. A preliminary study by the American Enterprise Institute's Neighborhood Revitalization Project found that within one year of the 1982 turnover to tenant management, administrative costs were cut by 63 percent, and maintenance (the major outlay) by 26 percent. In addition, rental income was increased significantly, thanks to improved collection and reduced vacancy rates, such that the project began to run a healthy operating surplus.

Success as a tenant management association could be a sensible prerequisite to apply to a group of public housing tenants wishing to purchase as a cooperative. An alternative requirement would be the creation of a private Mutual Housing Association, as that suggested in Patterson, New Jersey, to provide management assistance and training to achieve operating cost reductions. The tenants would be members of this association, which could foster cooperative or any other suitable form of tenant ownership. Another equity-building approach would be for the tenants to enter into a lease-purchase agreement. The operating subsidy would then be capped, and savings achieved by the tenants would be accumulated as equity shares until the full purchase could be accomplished, whereupon title would be transferred.

The savings achievable through tenant management is critical both to the success of any ownership plan and to the number of tenants that could hope to utilize it. Most studies of the potential for ownership among public housing tenants suggest that it is very small. But these calculations ignore the substantial reductions in cost that can be achieved—if tenants have an incentive—and thus grossly underestimate the possibilities of ownership.

A PUBLIC HOUSING HOMEOWNERSHIP PROGRAM

The Administration, utilizing existing law and with the agreement and cooperation of communities and PHAs, should experiment with a homeowner program for public housing tenants. The President should make it clear that the objective is not to raise income but to promote ownership in poor communities. Special buildings for the elderly or the handicapped should be excluded from the program, so that the number of such units available for rent would not be reduced.

In addition, Congress should enact a "Public Tenants Right to Buy Program." The measure should give groups of tenants the right to be included in the homeownership program, even if the local PHA opposes ownership. Such a group of tenants would apply directly to the Secretary of HUD. If eligible, according to the criteria below, HUD would set in motion the ownership process, and the PHA would be required to provide the resident association with a mortgage according to HUD rules. Legislation should also be enacted to expand the housing voucher program so that tenants unable to buy a share of a co-op, or other ownership vehicle, such as lease-purchase, could continue as renters.

Eligibility

The program would center generally on purchases by successful tenant management associations. As the tenant management associations or mutual housing associations improved tenant skills and reduced operating costs, savings to the PHA would be placed into an escrow account toward the purchase price, or as the equity element of a lease-purchase agreement. The purchase process would begin when this transitional arrangement reduced running costs sufficiently for the tenants to have a reasonable chance of meeting the costs of ownership.

To be eligible for membership in the purchasing organizations, tenant-buyers should have been good tenants in the specific building for at least one year and good public housing tenants for at least three years. This would help assure stable buyers of good character. Tenants unable to meet this criterion would not be permitted to purchase.

Discount and resale

An eligible association, comprised of eligible tenants, would be allowed to purchase the building at 30 percent of the assessed market value. No down payment would be required. If a co-op member were to sell his share within the one year, his portion of the entire 70 percent discount would be repayable to the PHA. This repayable portion would fall by 10 percent annual segments (of the initial market price) until, after seven years, the member would be free to keep all resale proceeds. The prospect of gain should be sufficient to establish the notion of equity, and so offset the lack of a down payment.

Financing

Eligible tenant management associations accepted into the program would have the right to a mortgage from the PHA under the legislation proposed. Since the PHA would be the owner of the building in the first place, this would involve no transfer of cash, only the replacement of rent payments to the PHA with mortgage payments. The interest rate on the mortgage would be adjusted to reflect the marginal tax benefits available to typical first-time homebuyers.

Tenant associations could purchase outright or purchase according to a shared-equity plan. With either method of purchase, the housing authority would continue to operate the units occupied by tenants refusing or ineligible to join the ownership associations. Existing tenants, in other words, would not be evicted. Eligible tenants could, however, buy into the purchase plan at any time. If some of the tenants continued to remain renters, supported by the government, that portion of the building would be considered a set of units owned by the PHA—thus the PHA would not be a shareholder in the cooperative. However, maintenance services to these units could be provided by the tenant ownership association under contract. An alternative might be for the federal government to guarantee to the association owning the building that vouchers would be provided to meet the costs of units still occupied by tenants.

Under a shared-equity arrangement, the tenant association could, in effect, buy a portion of the unit (minimum 50 percent) and continue to pay rent to the PHA on the remainder. The association could add to its ownership in increments, as finances permitted. Payment could be made in-kind (such as maintenance work) to obtain additional ownership shares. An alternative approach would be a lease-purchase arrangement, where tenants could build up equity credits, but would not take title until they could finance the entire sale price of the building.

Resale

The part-owner could sell his unit in the normal way, subject to the provisions regarding discount repayment, but he would have to return the original cost of the rented portion of his unit to the PHA. Alternatively, he could sell his share to an eligible buyer willing to take on his shared equity responsibilities. The tenant would have the right to a mortgage from the PHA, with a limit based on income and a below-market interest rate, offsetting the reduced tax relief available to low-income tenants.

CONCLUSION

The program suggested is not a proposal to sell off public housing to developers or suburban homesteaders. It is a device to provide ownership opportunities for existing tenants of public housing projects. If successful, it could transform some of the most troublesome communities in the nation's urban areas. It draws on the known successes of tenant management associations and that powerful ingredient of commitment to neighborhood—ownership. Turning public housing tenants into homeowners in this way would utilize the strengths and ownership dreams of residents themselves to help overcome the debilitating problem of America's inner cities.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 428

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Homestead Act of 1985".

"PUBLIC HOUSING HOMEOWNERSHIP AND MANAGEMENT OPPORTUNITIES

"SEC. 20. (a) HOMEOWNERSHIP OPPORTUNITIES.—The families residing in each public housing project shall be provided with the opportunity to purchase the dwelling units in such project as follows:

"(1) A homeownership association shall be formed in the public housing project that—

"(A) has as its members each family residing in a dwelling unit in such project that—

"(i) is interested in purchasing such dwelling unit;

"(ii) has resided in public housing projects for not less than 24 consecutive months;

"(iii) has resided in such dwelling unit for not less than 12 consecutive months; and

"(iv) is determined by the Secretary to be capable of assuming the responsibilities of homeownership;

"(B) follows domocratic procedures in making decisions; and

"(C) complies with such additional requirements as the Secretary may establish in regulations issued under subsection (e).

"(2)(A) The Secretary shall provide comprehensive improvement assistance under section 14 to public housing projects in which homeownership activities under this section are conducted in order to ensure that the physical condition, management, and operation of such projects are sufficient to permit and encourage homeownership by the families residing in such projects.

"(B) The Secretary, and the public housing agency owning and operating each public housing project, shall provide such training, technical assistance, and educational assistance as may be necessary to prepare the families residing in such project, and any homeownership association established under paragraph (1), for homeownership.

"(C) An amount equal to any reduction in the operating expenses of a public housing project realized as a result of the assistance provided under subparagraph (B) shall be paid by the Secretary to the public housing agency involved on behalf of the families residing in such project, and any homeownership association established under paragraph (1). Such public housing agency shall reduce the purchase price established in paragraph (5) for dwelling units in such project by an aggregate amount equal to such amount paid by the Secretary.

"(3)(A) A homeownership association may purchase all or part of a public housing project following a determination by the Secretary that—

"(i) such association is prepared to undertake the ownership, management, and maintenance of such project with continued assistance from the Secretary; and

"(2) If any family resides in a dwelling unit in a public housing project in which other dwelling units are purchased under this section, and such family decides not to purchase such dwelling unit, the Secretary may offer—

"(A) to assist such family in relocating to a dwelling unit in another public housing project; or

"(B) to provide to such family a housing voucher determined by the Secretary to be appropriate to permit such family to obtain comparable alternative housing.

"(d) FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE.—(1) The Secretary shall provide to public housing agencies such financial assistance as the Secretary determines is necessary to permit such agencies to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(2) The Secretary may provide financial assistance to any homeownership association or family that has purchased property under this section for purposes of reducing the operating and maintenance expenses of such association or family with respect to such property. Such financial assistance may be made in such form (including housing vouchers) and in such amounts as the Secretary determines to be appropriate.

"(e) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall issue such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section. Such regulations may establish any additional terms and conditions for homeownership or resident management under this section that are determined by the Secretary to be appropriate.

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 429. A bill to extend the statute of limitations for fraud under the customs laws and to clarify the extent of Government access to grand jury proceedings; to the Committee on Finance.

STEEL IMPORT FRAUD

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, for some time now I have been engaged in an effort to increase the enforcement capabilities of the U.S. Customs Service against steel import fraud. This activity has become pervasive as a means for importers to circumvent U.S. trade laws and international steel agreements. Increases in both the frequency of incidence and variations in the types of fraud committed have been registered by import specialists of the Customs Service. The widespread nature of the problem is evident in the fact that the Customs Service has had 30 class 1, high priority cases open involving the importation of steel by fraudulent methods.

Last year, in part as a result of my efforts, the Customs Service has undertaken a major initiative to combat violations in this problem area which will go a long way toward deterring steel import fraud.

However, problems still remain which inhibit Customs' ability to prosecute violators under civil statutes after they are caught, and it is under civil statutes that penalties large enough to deter violators or potential violators can be imposed.

First, because Customs attorneys wait until the U.S. attorneys finish with criminal proceedings before beginning a civil suit, they often run out of time before they can properly pursue a civil case. Presently, the statute of limitations governing Customs' activities which is contained in 19 U.S.C. 1621, requires that cases in which there is only enough evidence to show negligence or gross negligence be finished within 5 years from the date of violation. Cases where there is enough evidence to charge fraud on the other hand are allowed 5 years from date of discovery. Since it is often some time between when a violation is committed and when it is discovered—even several years—the statute of limitations for negligence and gross negligence places a severe constraint on Customs attorneys. In some cases even though the prosecution has developed enough evidence to demonstrate fraud in the criminal case using a grand jury, civil division attorneys run out of time under the statute before they can petition for access to that evidence. The bill I am introducing today makes the statute of limitations governing such cases a uniform 5 years from date of discovery, thereby giving Customs attorneys more time to gain access to grand jury materials in those cases where initial investigation only yields enough evidence to show negligence—or gross negligence.

The second problem facing Customs attorneys is the consequence of two recent Supreme Court decisions—United States versus Sells Engineering and United States versus Baggot—which have made it difficult for them to gain access to evidence developed by criminal prosecutors through a grand jury. Without such access, Customs attorneys often must begin a civil case from scratch. This is an unacceptable waste of Government resources which allows violators to escape the burden of full penalties.

The particular problem faced by Customs attorneys arises from a criterion imposed in the Baggot case. Specifically, in order to gain access, Customs attorneys must demonstrate that they are "preliminary to a judicial proceedings." But, the Court declined to describe what point in the Customs administrative procedure constituted "preliminary to." Mr. President, my legislation clears up the ambiguity left in the wake of the Court's decision by amending 19 U.S.C. 1592, the statute which governs Customs activities in this regard to designate a prepenalty notice issued in the course of Customs Service civil procedure as preliminary to a judicial procedure.

There are, of course, more general problems which have been caused by the Court's decision to limit the Government's access to grand jury evidence for use in civil procedures. I am, therefore, considering legislation which will address this question on a broader basis. For the purposes of increasing the enforcement capabilities of the Customs Service, however, the bill which I am introducing today will simply clarify what they must demonstrate in a petition for such access.

Mr. President, the changes which I have proposed in civil statutes will allow the Customs Service to impose the maximum penalty on companies found to be in violation of U.S. trade law. They will result in a higher level of deterrence against steel import fraud and enhance the effectiveness of the Customs initiative which is currently underway.

This bill is identical to legislation I introduced last year as S. 2531. Now that there has been some time for Customs and the business community to review the matter, I hope we will be able to move promptly on it this year.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill along with a copy of my testimony on this problem before the Commerce and Energy Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations on September 21, 1983 and a recent article from 33 Metal Producing be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 429

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 621 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1621) is amended by—

(1) striking out the first proviso; and

(2) striking out "Provided further" and inserting in lieu thereof "Provided".

SEC. 2. Section 592 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C 1592) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) GRAND JURY MATTERS.—For purposes of Rule 6(e)(3)(C)(i) of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, disclosure otherwise prohibited by such rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may be made to the government upon a showing by the government that—

"(1) a prepayment penalty notice has been issued under subsection (b)(1) of this section; and

"(2) the evidence sought may be relevant to the enforcement of this section.".

TESTIMONY BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATION ON STEEL IMPORT FRAUD—FRAUD WITHOUT FEAR

I would first like to commend Chairman Dingell for his extensive investigation of import fraud in a number of sectors, including steel. It is a matter of serious concern not only to our ailing steel and support industries in the U.S. but also to our entire nation. My purpose today is to express support for your investigation, knowing that it will be thorough, constructive and fair, and to offer my help in developing a legislative response to the problems you uncover.

In developing that response. I'd like to share with you some of what I have learned in my own research and investigation. The word "steel" has become synonymous with tragedy. The industry has been dangerously weakened. Steel communities are deeply depressed. And steel workers are nearly without hope. A few years ago our steel industry was the strongest in the world. Today its sad statistics include 100,000 unemployed, $3.5 billion in losses last year, and a 56% operating rate despite the general economic recovery. It is a cruel injustice that many a job has been lost to fraudulently imported foreign steel.

A strong government effort at deterring fraud will certainly not alleviate all the problems of the industry but it will be of significant help. It is also worth noting that such an action is not a protectionist measure. It is simply matter of justice, of enforcing our present laws.

Or course it is also a matter of revenue, since the Customs Officials generally take in $19 for every dollar spent.

Both the Customs Service and the Justice Department bear a serious responsibility for deficiencies in deterring steel import fraud. And the increase in fraudulently imported steel can be traced to a combination of insufficient resources, a low priority given to this problem, and unwillingness of both Customs and the Justice Department to emphasize prompt civil actions against such imports. I understand that there are currently over 40 active cases under investigation involving steel import fraud. Some of these cases date back to 5 to 7 years.

With respect to resources, Customs has compounded the problem by proposing a program to drastically reduce the manpower levels of import specialists at the same time it has proclaimed import fraud as an area of renewed emphasis. Import specialists are essential to fraud detection and they need additional support, not lip service. And they certainly do not need cut backs.

In addition, the physical equipment resources at U.S. ports to aid in fraud detection are almost nonexistent. Currently, no ports except New Orleans possess on-site chemical analysis equipment or a Customs weighing system. This type of equipment—which is basic to effective enforcement—should be provided to all major steel ports.

Enforcement seems half-hearted. Looking at investigations and prosecutions already completed, I am disappointed in the size of the penalties levied. Substantial penalties are a key factor in deterrence. A mere slap on the wrist invites the greedy to try again and again * * * which they have successfully. Maximum penalties should be levied on offenders; especially those involving large foreign firms or trading companies. Instead of civil suits which are easier to win and allow bigger fines, the government has preferred criminal investigations and prosecutions in large cases of steel fraud. Unfortunately, Justice Department policy effectively limits the maximum criminal fine $200,000 which is but a fraction of the profit a large company or trading company will make on the transaction. Of course, jail sentences are an alternative, but the Justice Department has not generally sought them.

Civil cases, on the other hand, can result in penalties as high as the value of the goods involved. This could result, in some cases, in multimillion dollar fines. The threat of such penalties would certainly be a greater deterrent, especially on foreign nationals with U.S. subsidiaries importing the steel. Further, the burden of proof for civil fraud is considerably less than that necessary for a successful criminal prosecution.

Unfortunately the government has consistently opted for the more difficult, less punitive (criminal) route. In sum, investigations proceed at a snail pace, fines are inconsequential, convictions rare, resources shrinking and the deterrent nil. Our government has unwittingly issued an invitation to "Fraud without fear."

Finally, we should all recognize that the likelihood of steel import fraud is greater today than it has ever been. The worldwide recession coupled with persistent steel oversupply and overcapacity has led to fierce competition to push steel through the path of least resistance, i.e., the open U.S. market. Moreover, the October 1982, Steel Agreement and the recent specialty steel import restraints offer ingenious exporters many opportunities for fraudulent circumvention such as misdesignating the country of origin, grade misidentification, etc. I understand that Secretary of Commerce Baldrige has stated that aggressive enforcement of our trade laws could limit steel imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market. I look forward to that aggressive effort. Meanwhile we must continue our efforts to tighten up fraud detection in the face of these increased import pressures.

With respect to solutions, the Senate Finance Committee has already approved my amendment to increase the budget of Customs' steel fraud program. That proposal should also be included in the Treasury Customs Service Appropriation. I am also preparing a resolution to address both the resource problem and the need for stiffer penalties which I will shortly submit to the Senate.

These hearings today and tomorrow should awaken the Congress and the public to the problem of steel import fraud and will be a significant aid in obtaining legislative remedies. I am committed to work with you, Mr. Chairman, in developing and enacting such remedies.

STEEL IMPORT FRAUD: CLOAKS, DAGGERS AND A CACHE OF SMOKING GUNS

(By Joseph J. Innace)

All Points Bulletin: Fraudulent steel imports can turn up at any major U.S. port of entry.

Case 1: (resolved) Special agents for the U.S. Customs Service uncover that Thyssen Metal Service, Detroit, Mich., has been falsifying entry documents for cold-rolled steel. In a ploy to avoid the U.S. trade barriers for certain steel products, Thyssen passed the material along as a higher quality metal but then sold it in the States at a lower price.

Thyssen is charged with two criminal counts of import fraud and is indicted March 1984. Result: Thyssen agrees to a $3.25-million civil suit out-of-court settlement.

Case 2: (resolved) June 25, 1984. Louis Waterman, Philadelphia, pleads guilty to 19 counts of import fraud relating to the movement of foreign steel flanges. Waterman is fined $30,000 and sentenced to 500 hrs of community service and a two-year probation.

Case 3: (resolved) Contractors Steel, Livonia, Mich, pleads guilty to three counts of import fraud after being indicted for removing country-or-origin markings on steel products. Result: A $12,000 fine in federal district court.

Case 4: (still open) Daewoo International America Corp., New York, which deals in Korean steel, is charged with making false statements to the U.S. government in an alleged attempt to import foreign steel restricted by U.S. trade agreements. Nine employees are indicted in March 1984 on 32 counts of fraud.

Case 5: (shipment seized) October 31, 1984. Customs' Special Agent, Eugene J. Weinschenk, in charge of Connecticut, reports the seizure of almost 2,000 t of cold-rolled sheet steel valued at close to $800,000. Invoiced as black plate at a 5.6% tariff, the cold-rolled steel is correctly classified in the U.S. tariff schedule at 6.6%.

"More importantly," says Weinschenk, "by agreement between the United States and the European Economic Council, cold-rolled steel can only be imported if accompanied by an 'EEC Export Certificate.'" Since the cold-rolled steel was misdescribed, to avoid the certificate requirement, the shipment—from a steel company in Greece and imported by a Connecticut corporation—was confiscated as a restricted importation under federal law.

While cloak-and-dagger escapades of this ilk would bring a twinkle to the eye of a Sergeant Joe Friday or an Eliot Ness, not all cases of customs fraud are as dramatic. In many instances, in fact, what appears to be illegal maneuvering of material to skirt trade laws or tariff schedules is actually poor paperwork on the part of importers or their customs brokers, who mistakenly classify entering goods.

Premeditated or not, misclassification can severely disrupt the domestic marketplace. And the U.S. Customs Service makes no distinctions. The country's border enforcers are, in fact, busy stalking all steel-related infractions—and at a pace more intense, perhaps, than ever before.

FRAUDBUSTERS

Right now, the US Customs Service reports, some 40 major cases involving suspected steel import fraud are under investigation, many uncovered, thanks to "Operation Tripwire." Announced last April by Customs Service Commissioner William Von Raab and Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa), Operation Tripwire is a specially targeted Customs program aimed at stopping steel-importing violations directly at ports of entry.

"At the moment, there are 118 people in the steel program," says Jim Mahan of the US Customs Service, Washington, DC. "We have 94 import specialists, 24 special agents, and task forces situated in three major cities—all assigned to steel."

The question, of course, is whether a 118-person staff is sufficient to adequately track the huge volumes of steel imports to these shores. Opinions vary.

"The incidence of misclassification alone, and not necessarily outright fraud, is a very big and serious problem," says a spokesman for the American Iron and Steel Institute (AISI), Washington, DC. 'The Customs Service suspects that at least 30% of the documents pertaining to imported steel are wrong in some fashion. Maybe a countervailing duty was omitted," he cites an example. "Or the incorrect tariff schedule was referenced. Any number of things can go wrong when you're dealing with such a complex system of tariff schedules."

One reason for the errors, the AISI official suggests, is that much of the documentation is handled by customs brokers rushing to push through the paperwork.

Doris Beckmann, of Beckmann & Beckmann International, New York, a customs broker that does not deal in steel, disagrees. "Too much of a generalization," she counters, maintaining that those in her profession actually represent the U.S. Treasury Dept. and, as such, fully understand customs laws.

"That's our primary function," Beckmann emphasizes. "And every piece we handle is subject to subsequent analysis.

"The fact that we might be handling goods covered by quotas or trade restraints doesn't present any unusual difficulties," Beckmann claims. "We have one code of regulations to adhere to. You're sure of those regulations, regardless of the products being handled. There's really nothing to it," she says. "Speed is not a major consideration."

Special agents interviewed at one port agree. For the most part, they say, customs brokers are both conscientious and honest.

"The problems usually stem from the importers, or actual buyers of goods on these shores," says one. The customs brokers, he explains, typically work only with the information supplied them by the importer.

"Of course," he adds, "if the instructions a broker is issued look suspicious, and the shipment is put through regardless, that broker would be negligent."

On the other hand, it's not unusual for brokers to go out of their way to hold up a transaction carrying documentation that doesn't look quite right. "After forty years in this business," Beckmann comments, "you know what to watch out for. European export documents, for example, are always done well. But South American paperwork," Beckmann claims, "comes in carelessly prepared. A good broker is sensitive to such detail."

Any wrongful invoicing at the port of entry will, of course, have a ripple effect as the product winds its way through the marketplace. In extremes, improper invoicing—intentional or otherwise—can make actual U.S. selling prices next to meaningless.

A potentially greater danger is the impact such error can have on statistics collected by the Customs Service—the same statistics the steel industry relies on to conduct market analyses and facilities planning.

Consider this "worst case" scenario: An offshore tubular product shipment arrives in Houston, where a customs broker pays a 0.5% duty when the actual figure should be 6%. That difference affects the product's selling price in the U.S. market.

Since a lighter duty was paid, the product can be sold for less to compete with domestic material. If this occurs fairly frequently, of course, the statistics the Customs Service collects on tubular goods would not truly reflect home market demand patterns.

In any case, the AISI relies on Customs' import statistics and shares the figures with member companies. And it's not improbable that one of those companies would analyze the data, see offshore tubular shipments coming in at a relatively regular rate, and hinge an investment decision based on what it perceives as a market trend.

It might decide, say, to spend $50 million to upgrade a tubular finishing facility for a market that isn't nearly as strong as the supposedly reliable data indicates.

Far-fetched? There may be more of a connection than you think.

"The tubular section of the tariffs schedule is perhaps the most complex of all," says the AISI official. "It would be difficult to prove," he concedes, "but there's some connection between the possibly misleading statistics for this product category and the overbuilding of OCTG capacity by domestic producers."

A HIGH-TECH CRACKDOWN

In an atmosphere where steel imports—regardless of restraint mechanisms—are a constant source of controversy and very much a part of the domestic industrial scene, neither U.S. steelmakers nor Customs are satisfied that the offshore factors of the supply/demand equation are being monitored accurately and consistently.

"We're getting there and have made tremendous strides," says one Customs Service source, "but there's still a lot of work to be done. For instance," he notes, "until February 1983, when the Fraud Center was established, we never kept statistics on fraud cases."

Helping Customs crack down on would-be violators is the AISI, which has been involved in programs geared to train government personnel to identify steel. In its obvious best interest, the Institute has also given the department two portable metal analyzers to help check steel material claims at the docks. And the move has paid off.

The Customs Service already has one Applied Research Laboratories (ARL) 3600 Mobile Metal Analyzer, dubbed "Sparky," at its disposal. And another may be added this year.

Three years ago, the Customs Service field office in New Orleans was assigned the task of developing special expertise in the area of steel analysis. The upshot? A decision by the officials there that a mobile lab be created.

By mid-1983, the lab purchased the ARL 3600, which immediately analyzes 16 elements via emission spectrography by using a "pistol" applied against the steel sample. Through September of last year, the office had analyzed 692 samples, 496 by "Sparky" and 196 by conventional lab methods.

Fast as its work, the ARL unit performs a complete analysis in 10 minutes. The conventional method, of course, requires a sample to be cut and sent to the lab.

With "Sparky," sample cutting, a time-consuming procedure, is done on a very selective basis. If the analyzer uncovers a discrepancy between the material and its invoice description, the importer is told to have a sample cut for lab analysis. And "Sparky" has been right on target. To date, 90% of field results have been confirmed after followup lab analysis.

Case in point: A typical shipment of steel pipe conforming to API specs and entered under tariff schedule 610.39 might be valued at $500,000. Enter Customs and "Sparky," which spots chromium at 0.21% levels and reclassifies the material under 610.40.

The duty charged changes from 0.5% to 3.8%, amounting to an additional $16,500. And that's just the beginning.

The additional chromium will also result in a duty increase, and countervailing duties and penalties for violating antidumping trade laws are likely to be imposed.

"Sparky," the Fraud Center, indictments, task forces and special agents are all playing a vital role in what one Customs official characterizes as an evolution. "Customs has always been seen in an entirely domestic light," he says. "Recently, however, we're becoming more and more an instrument of foreign policy." And that instrument, he says, is getting sharper and more sophisticated every day.●

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. GARN, and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 430. A bill to amend and clarify the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

BUSINESS ACCOUNTING AND FOREIGN TRADE SIMPLIFICATION ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, along with Senator CHAFEE, Senator GARN, and Senator D'AMATO, I am today introducing the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act amendments in the same form in which they passed the Senate in the 97th Congress.

That effort, which culminated in Senate passage of S. 708 on November 23, 1981, was significant for its extensive hearings and bipartisan approach to the problem. That bipartisan spirit was attributable directly to the efforts of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) who, despite his misgivings about the bill cooperated with the committee in developing a fair and thoroughly researched compromise.

The committee held 5 days of hearings spanning 3 months and including 29 witnesses. Most significant, every witness requested by the minority was invited to appear. Some declined, but I do not think anyone can argue the hearings did not fully represent all sides of this issue or that the requests of opponents of the bill were not honored.

Additionally, at the request of the minority, we postponed markup on the bill for 6 weeks to permit all Members to better study the complex issues raised by the bill. During that time, the staff, in consultation with Senator D'AMATO and myself, developed a committee print which made a number of changes in S. 708 to accommodate concerns raised by the minority and correct drafting errors. Ultimately the committee print was adopted—by a bipartisan vote—and the bill reported with an additional clarifying amendment. On November 23, 1981, the Senate passed sequence of events was partially repeated in 1983 when the Banking Committee reported the same bill the Senate had previously passed. Unfortunately, other committee priorities, particularly the Export Administration Act, prevented full Senate consideration of the bill.

Our motivation in pursuing this bill is related to the serious deficiencies in present law. In the accounting section, present law potentially makes a corporation liable for the smallest accounting error—whether material or not, whether intentional or not, whether related to a corrupt payment or not. In fact, as the legislative history of this section makes clear, it is not an anticorruption section at all, but rather broad authority for the SEC to prosecute books and records errors.

In the words of former SEC Chairman Harold Williams in a policy statement discussing the accounting provisions:

> The anxieties created by the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act—among men and women of utmost good faith—have been, in my experience, without equal.

The other major difficulty of present law relates to its language concerning the relationship between a corporation and a third party, usually an agent, when it is the latter that actually makes the prohibited payment. This is a central issue because in many countries, foreign companies are either required by law or encouraged by custom and other means to deal with the Government through a national of that country.

In other countries where the bureaucracy is complex or corrupt, or where the language or social customs are difficult for westerners, it is clearly in a U.S. company's interest to employ an agent. Smaller businesses tend to be particularly dependent upon agents in their overseas activities, since they do not have the resources to establish their own offices.

Present law defines the company-agent relationship by making the company liable if it knows or has reason to know that the agent has made a corrupt payment. The reason-to-know language has been the source of the greatest uncertainty, complicated by the absence of useful guidance from the SEC or the Justice Department as to what the term might mean. This has led to assertions of breadth of coverage which themselves are breathtaking and which would totally cripple U.S. corporate activities in certain countries, were the law aggressively enforced in that way.

It is of small comfort to an executive when his lawyer tells him he may be liable under the law—personally and corporately—but not to worry because the Government may not prosecute, or if it does, he might not be convicted. The executive's obligation to himself and his company is to avoid uncertainty, avoid publicity, and avoid the time and expense of a lengthy investigation or court case.

Let me say, Mr. President, it would have been far easier to resolve some of these issues with calculated ambiguities but, frankly, if there is one criticism of Congress that probably is valid, it is that too often, Congress, in trying to compose differences, has left areas of ambiguity that have been counterproductive for all sides. This bill, Mr. President, instead confronts the issues directly and provides the greatest guidance possible to businesses which have to live with this statute on a day-to-day basis. I think the result will be a clearer law and, because of that, a better law. I believe that to be the case from the viewpoint of people on all sides of this issue. It is my hope that my colleagues will share my view of the bill's merits, but I have no expectation that this bill will be approved unanimously. I do, however, want to make clear our intent. Very simply, what we are trying to do is not weaken this law but clarify it. We are not reopening the door to corrupt payments. We are eliminating doubt as to what constitutes a corrupt payment and when a corporation is liable.

As Senators know, this bill, despite our hard work, was not passed by the House, nor even reported by the committees of jurisdiction. Throughout the latter part of 1982, however, a substantial effort was made to reach compromise with Congressman WIRTH, the chairman of one of the subcommittees to which the bill was referred. That effort, unfortunately was unsuccessful, despite considerable work in proposing various formulations by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE]. In the end we were unable to convince Congressman WIRTH of the urgency and importance of this matter and of the need to enact amendments free of ambiguous words and concepts. We did, however, have a constructive dialog and were able to narrow our differences. With the help of Senator CHAFEE and Senator D'AMATO I look forward to a continuation of that dialog. I expect a number of the changes we negotiated ultimately to find their way into this bill, and I anticipate further changes will be made as well as we attempt to develop the clearest and most precise legislation so as to best guide American businessmen operating abroad.

Our introduction of this bill at this time, Mr. President, signals our commitment to begin this process again. These amendments remain an administration priority, and they remain a business priority. Action on the bill is essential, and we will find a way to act as soon as possible. I expect the committee shortly to schedule a hearing on the bill and to proceed to markup soon afterward. I expect the bill soon to be on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 430

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Business Accounting and Foreign Trade Simplification Act".

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 was a positive and significant step toward the important objective of prohibiting bribery of foreign government officials by United States companies in order to obtain, retain, or direct business;

(2) the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 has caused unnecessary concern among existing and potential exporters as to the scope of legitimate overseas business activities;

(3) the accounting standards requirements of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977, which apply to all issuers of securities irrespective of whether they have foreign operations, are unclear and excessive and have caused costly and unnecessary paperwork burdens;

(4) United States agencies responsible for enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 have not sufficiently coordinated interpretation and enforcement practices with other agencies responsible for international trade policy, export promotion, foreign policy, international monetary policy, and other related civil and criminal statutes; and

(5) it is in the best interests of all countries to maintain responsible standards of corporate conduct in foreign markets to preserve free and equitable trading practices.

(b) The Congress concludes that—

(1) the principle objectives of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 are desirable, beneficial, and important to our Nation as well as to our relationships with our trading partners, and these objectives should remain the central intent of the Act;

(2) exporters should not be subject to unclear, conflicting, and potentially damaging demands by diverse United States agencies responsible for enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977;

(3) general compliance and enforcement practices associated with the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 should be developed in accordance with considerations underlying foreign relations, international trade, export promotion, international monetary policy, and other related civil and criminal statutes; and

(4) a solution to the problem of corrupt payments by firms to obtain or retain business demands and international approach; accordingly, appropriate international agreements should be initiated and sought by the United States agencies responsible for trade agreements and by the President.

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE GUIDELINES

SEC. 8. Title I of the Business Practices and Records Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"GUIDELINES AND GENERAL PROCEDURES FOR COMPLIANCE

"SEC. 105. (a) Not later than six months after the date of enactment of this section, the Attorney General, after consultation with the United States Trade Representative, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and after consultation with representatives of the business community and the interested public through public notice and comment and in public hearings, shall determine to what extent the business community would be assisted by further clarification of section 104 of this Act and shall, based on such determination and to the extent necessary and appropriate, have the authority to issue—

"(1) guidelines describing specific types of conduct associated with common types of export sales arrangements and business contracts which the Attorney General determines constitute compliance with the provisions of section 104 of this Act; and

"(2) general precautionary procedures which issuers or domestic concerns may use on a voluntary basis to ensure compliance with this Act, and to create a rebuttable presumption of compliance with this Act.

The guidelines and procedures referred to in the preceding sentence shall be issued in accordance with sections 551 through 557 of title 5, United States Code.

"(b) The Attorney General, after consultation with other Federal agencies and representatives from the business community, shall establish a Business Practices and Records Act Review Procedure for the purposes of providing responses to specific inquiries concerning enforcement intentions under this Act. The Attorney General shall issue opinions, within thirty days, in response to requests from domestic concerns, regarding compliance with the requirements of the provisions of section 104 of this Act. An opinion that certain prospective conduct does not involve a violation shall be final and binding on all parties, subject to the discovery of new evidence. When appropriate, and at reasonable intervals, the responses derived from the review procedure will be reviewed by the Attorney General to determine whether such compilation of responses should be included in a new guideline pursuant to subsection (a).

"(c) Any document or other material provided to, received by, or prepared in the Department of Justice, or any other department or agency of the United States Government, in connection with a request by a domestic concern for a statement of present enforcement intentions under the Business Practices and Records Act Review Procedure pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, or in connection with any investigations conducted to enforce this Act, shall be exempt from disclosure under section 552 of title 5, United States Code, regardless of whether the Department responds to such a request or the applicant withdraws such request prior to receiving a response. The Attorney General shall protect the privacy of each applicant, and shall adopt rules assuring that materials, documents, and information submitted in connection with a review procedure request will be kept confidential and will not be used for any purpose that would unnecessarily discourage use of the review procedure. The review procedure shall be developed and instituted in accordance with section 551 through 557 and 701 through 706 of title 5, United States Code.

"(d) The Attorney General shall make a special effort to provide timely compliance guidance to potential exporters, and smaller businesses, who as a practical matter are unable to obtain specialized counsel on issues pertaining to this Act. Such assistance shall be limited to requests for enforcement intention disclosures provided for under this Act, and general explanations of compliance responsibilities and of potential liabilities under the Act.

"(e)(1) On September 1 of each year the Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress and make public a detailed report on all actions which the Department of Justice has taken pursuant to this Act, along with its views on problems associated with implementation, its plan for the next fiscal year to further implement the Act, and recommendations for amendments.

"(2) On September 1 of each year the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission shall file with the Congress a detailed report on all actions which the Commission has taken pursuant to section 13(b) of the Securities Exchange Act, its views on problems associated with implementation, its plans for the next fiscal year to further implement such section, and its recommendations for amendment.".

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

SEC. 9. (a) It is the sense of the Congress that the President should pursue the negotiation of an international agreement among the largest possible number of nations on illicit payments, including a process by which problems and conflicts associated with such practices could be resolved.

(b) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the President shall report to Congress on—

(1) the progress of the negotiations referred to in subsection (a);

(2) those steps which the administration and Congress should consider taking in the event that these negotiations do not successfully eliminate the competitive disadvantage of United States business; and

(3) possible actions that could be taken to promote cooperation by other nations in international efforts to prevent bribery of foreign officials, candidates, or parties in third countries.

This report shall also include recommendations for any new legislation required to give the President authority to take appropriate action to achieve such objectives. The report shall contain an anlaysis of the potential effect on the interests of the United States including United States national security of the corruption of foreign officials and political leaders in connection with international business transactions involving persons and business enterprises of other nations. In addition, the report shall assess the current and future rule in curtailing such corruption of private initiatives such as the Recommendations to Government and Rules of Conduct to Combat Extortion and Bribery developed by the International Chamber of Commerce.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senators HEINZ, GARN, and D'AMATO in introducing the Business Accounting and Foreign Trade Simplification Act.

This bill is identical to the Senate-passed version of S. 708, a bill which I authored and introduced in the 97th Congress.

Mr. President, I have been committed to achieving these vital changes in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act for 4 years now. The changes this bill makes in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act are critical to maintaining our position in the world export market. Ambassador Brock, U.S. Trade Representative, has referred to the need for these changes as being at least as great as the need for addressing foreign subsidies, local content laws, hidden taxes, or nontariff barriers.

Mr. President, this bill is intended to preserve the purposes of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act—that is, putting an end to large-scale bribery of foreign officials by American corporations. What we propose is to reduce some of the confusion that the act has generated. The bill had had strong support from the business community, the agencies responsible for its enforcement, the administration, and other Members of Congress from both political parties.

Specifically, the bill would do as follows:

First, change the name of the act: The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act would become the Business Practices and Records Act. This reflects the fact that the accounting standards are not limited to international companies or transactions. It also would not make a presumption that corruption exists.

Second, enforcement: With regard to the bribery provisions, the Department of Justice, which has sole jurisdiction under the FCPA for criminal enforcement of both privately and publicly held companies and civil enforcement of privately held companies, would be given sole jurisdiction of civil enforcement for publicly held companies as well. Thus, any company with questions about the bribery provisions could get them answered in one place. The Securities and Exchange Commission would retain responsibility for civil enforcement of the accounting standards provisions.

Third, bribery provision: Congress made clear its intent to exclude so-called facilitating payments from the reach of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. However, the statute is not clear as to what constitutes such payments. They are defined as payments to secure or expedite the performance of a routine governmental action as distinguished from action involving the exercise of discretion. The reference to the exercise of judgment is also deleted. Payments which are lawful in the country where they are made, and which are intended to secure prompt performance of a foreign official's duties, would not be actionable under this bill. There is also a clarifying exclusion for token courtesy gifts and incidental benefits received by foreign officials in the course of marketing activities or product presentations.

The bill also makes it clear that there is no violation in making payment if they are legal under the laws and regulations of the foreign country involved.

Under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, companies are liable if they have a reason to know that a bribe may be paid by a third party or intermediary. This provision was identified in the 1980 executive branch study of export disincentives as the area of greatest concern to business. The bill replaces this provision with language that makes U.S. companies liable if they corruptly pay a bribe directly or if they directed or authorized the bribe expressly or by a course of conduct.

Fourth, accounting standards: The books and records provision is deleted. The bill also defines the terms "reasonable assurances" and "reasonable detail," which exist in the current law. Thus, it is made explicit that the use of cost/benefit evaluation is to be applied to internal accounting controls. This makes it clear that companies are not expected to design control systems whose costs exceed the benefit to the companies and to their stockholders. Currently, the Securities and Exchange Commission says the cost/benefit evaluation is to be applied. But the law does not say so. The bill would put it into the law.

Fifth, international agreement: This bill contains extensive provisions on the desirability of international agreements to establish standards for international business practices. The President would be required to submit a report to Congress within 1 year of enactment of this legislation explaining steps that the United States could take to promote cooperation by other countries to prevent bribery.

Let us not waste another Congress, another year, or another month. We are losing overseas business and jobs each day we delay. U.S. Trade Representative Brock has testified before the Senate that this law alone has cost U.S. industry billions of dollars in sales and thousands of jobs. Our mounting trade deficit makes further delay unjustifiable.

In countries such as Indonesia, and the Philippines, U.S. companies are hamstrung by the fact that Japanese and South Korean firms frequently make large payments or provide special deals to local officials or businessmen in return for import licenses or approval of investments. Such payments are subject to stiff penalties under the U.S. law.

I am certainly not advocating bribery but as presently worded, the law is vague and cumbersome and has become a severe impediment to American trade.

I do hope that the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance will produce a bill this spring so as to make full congressional approval a reality before the end of this year. Action of this matter is long overdue.

I remain committed to the enactment of this bill and will do all I can to achieve that goal this year.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today, the Business Accounting and Foreign Trade Simplification Act, a bill which would amend and clarify the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977, is being reintroduced and I am pleased to be an original cosponsor.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act was enacted to prevent U.S. corporations from committing acts of bribery outside the boundaries of the United States. Certainly no one will disagree with the spirit of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act; however, some of the provisions of the act tended to have a chilling effect on legitimate international business operations of some of our domestic companies. At times, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act has caused confusion when corporations have attempted to comply with its overbroad prohibitions and unclear accounting standards. The Business Accounting and Foreign Trade Simplification Act will remedy this by narrowing some of the prohibitions and by providing a clearer standard regarding the state of mind of the person committing the violative act.

During the 97th Congress, Senator HEINZ held hearings on the Business Accounting and Foreign Trade Simplification Act in the International Finance and Monetary Policy Subcommittee of which he is the chairman, while I conducted hearings in the Securities Subcommittee regarding the enforcement standards for the accounting sections of the FCPA which are administered by the SEC. These hearings made a compelling case for passage of this legislation; and the Senate wisely passed S. 708 in the 97th Congress. Joint hearings were held between Senator HEINZ and myself; however, we were unable to enact S. 414 in the 98th Congress. I am hopeful that we can expedite consideration and send the bill to the House of Representatives so that the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act no longer puts a damper on American corporations doing business abroad.

In today's economy, we need to encourage international trade rather than hamper it with ambiguous laws.●

S. 431. A bill to restore the broad scope of coverage and to clarify the application of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today Senator WEICKER and I, together with 42 of our Senate colleagues, are introducing legislation that will complete the most important unfinished business of the past Congress and restore the full force and effectiveness of our Nation's civil rights laws.

Last October, a small minority used a filibuster to prevent the Senate from enacting legislation designed to reaffirm that Federal financial assistance may not be used to support discrimination against any person on the basis of race, color, national origin, sex, disability, or age. That legislation was designed to undo the unfortunate consequences of the Supreme Court's decision last year in Grove City College v. Bell, 104 S. Ct. 1211 (1984), which left a serious loophole in the four basic laws that protect millions of women, the elderly, minorities, and the handicapped from discrimination.

This year we are introducing the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985, which will reverse that decision—and all of its effects—and restore title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 to the broad scope of coverage which characterized their application under the four prior administrations.

WHY THIS LEGISLATION IS NECESSARY

education. While the Court held unanimously that Grove City is a recipient of Federal financial assistance because of basic educational opportunity grants [BEOG] provided to its students, a 6-to-3 majority construed title IX's "program or activity" language to reach only the school's student financial aid office. As a result, many schools throughout the country are now free to discriminate in many, if not all, of their course offerings, extracurricular activities, or student programs and effective enforcement has become virtually impossible. During the last year, the Department of Education alone halted work on over 60 cases involving educational institutions and is in the process of reviewing many more.

But title IX is only one of four major civil rights laws that prohibit discrimination by those receiving Federal funds. Congress expressly modeled title IX after title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or national origin. Similarly, section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 contain the same "program or activity" language. Each of these statutes is therefore susceptible to the same limitation applied to education in Grove City. In fact, the Supreme Court clearly indicated its intention to apply the Grove City reasoning to the other statutes in deciding a section 504 case on the same day Grove City was handed down, Consolidated Rail Corp. v. Darrone, 104 S. Ct. 1248 (1984). And the administration has proceeded to apply Grove City to these other laws. The Department of Education has not only dropped title IX cases, but also cases under title VI, section 504, and the Age Discrimination Act.

Similarly, while title IX is limited to discrimination in education and while the Grove City case dealt with a college, it is clear that the Court's restrictive interpretation of "program and activity" is applicable to noneducation institutions as well. Thus, restoration of a broad interpretation "program or activity" must reach beyond education to forestall Federal funding of discrimination in such areas as health, transportation, social service, and economic development. The Darrone case, for example, applied Grove City to a section 504 case dealing with employment by a railroad. And Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights William Bradford Reynolds has stated that from the outset that he intends to apply to the Grove City holding to other civil rights laws in all of the areas they cover.

In short, unless we amend all four laws, we cannot eliminate all of the effects of the Grove City case and will not restore these laws to the broad scope of coverage and protection which Congress originally intended and which characterized their administration for over 20 years.

WHAT THE BILL DOES

Coverage. The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 amends each of the affected statutes by adding a section defining the phrase "program or activity" to make clear that discrimination is prohibited throughout entire agencies or institutions if any part receives Federal financial assistance. Thus, the language of the statutes will conform to the enforcement practices of previous Republican and Democratic administrations.

The definition of "program or activity" contains four applications of the principle of institution-wide coverage:

First, the operations of a department or agency of a State or local government are covered when Federal funds are extended to any part of the department or agency. For example, if Federal health assistance is extended to a part of the State health department, the entire health department would be covered in all of its operations. In the case of assistance to a State or local government, as distinguished from aid to a designated department or agency, the particular entity that distributes the Federal assistance is covered as well as any departments or agencies to which the assistance goes. For example, if the office of a mayor receives Federal financial assistance and distributes it to local departments or agencies, all of the operations of the mayor's office are covered along with the departments or agencies which actually get the aid.

Second, both individual universities and systems of higher education are covered in their entirety if any part receives Federal financial assistance. Under the bill, if a part of a university receives Federal aid, the entire university is covered. When a campus which is part of a "system of higher education" is receiving Federal financial assistance, then the entire system of which the campus is a part is covered.

Under the bill, local education agencies and other school systems are covered entirely when any part receives Federal funds. "Local education agency" is defined in the manner set forth in section 198(a)(10) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 2854(a)(10)) and includes any agency, such as a board of education, with administrative control and direction over a public elementary or secondary school or group of schools, and the schools themselves.

Third, corporations, partnerships, and other private organizations which receive Federal financial assistance also are fully covered by the nondiscrimination requirements. For example, if a private hospital corporation gets Federal assistance for its emergency room, all of the operations of the hospital, including, for example, the operating rooms, pediatrics department, admissions and discharge offices are covered.

Fourth, appropriate applications of the institution-wide principle must be made to determine coverage of entities not specifically listed. Thus, for example, a college which receives any Federal assistance would be covered in its entirety. A local water district which receives aid would be covered in its entirety just as a water department of a State or local government would be. And an individual who gets a Federal research grant would be required not to discriminate just as a group of individuals in a private organization would be.

Enforcement. The enforcement section of each statute is also amended to include the same proposal on fund termination that was in last year's bill.

The reason for this change lies in the sponsors' determination to maintain a distinction that was the essence of these four laws prior to Grove City—a distinction between broad institutionwide coverage on the one hand and effective, but narrowly targeted fund termination, on the other.

Though Grove City did not deal expressly with the fund termination issue we have changed the language because dictum in North Haven Board of Education v. Bell, 546 U.S. 512 (1982), might permit opponents of this legislation to argue that leaving the language unamended could well result in a broadening of fund termination.

The new fund termination language assures that the prior practice will be maintained. Fund termination will continue to be applied as a last resort after efforts to achieve voluntary compliance have failed. Other enforcement provisions remain unchanged. Funding agencies will continue to have the option of securing enforcement through referral to the Department of Justice for suit. The right of individuals to sue privately also is undisturbed.

WHAT THE NEW LEGISLATION DOES NOT DO

The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will not create any new obligations for those who receive Federal assistance.

The regulatory definition of who or what is a "recipient" of Federal financial assistance under these laws remains unchanged and the bill does not require any changes in it. For example, entities or persons, such as farmers, which were determined not to be recipients under prior law because they were the ultimate beneficiaries of Federal assistance would not have their status changed.

The constitutionally and statutorily protected rights of private individuals and organizations are not affected by the bill. All existing exemptions, including the title IX "religious tenet" exemption would be preserved.

HOW THE BILL DIFFERS FROM LAST YEAR'S BILL

The bill we are introducing today achieves the institutionwide coverage which was the purpose of the measure that passed the House of Representatives last year and was almost adopted by the Senate. Like its predecessor, this bill amends all four statutes in exactly the same way. However, in order to answer the criticism that last year's bill was too complex and, therefore, unclear, this year we have taken a different approach.

Last Year, S. 2568 would have deleted the term "program or activity" from the four civil rights statutes and replaced it with the term "recipient" defined along the lines of the definitions of that term in the implementing regulations. Opponents of retaining the laws' vitality used the lengthy recipient definition to raise many questions and charges of ambiguity. By retaining the term "program or activity" and explicitly defining its meaning in the major contexts where the law is applied, no valid charges of ambiguity can now be raised.

Mr. President, no Congress that adheres to the principle of equal justice under law can permit the Grove City College decision to stand. I welcome Senator DOLE's initiative in introducing his own legislation because it indicates that the Grove City issue will be a high priority in the 99th Congress. But, his bill is not an adequate response to the problems created by Grove City. Proposals that would restore the law only for certain beneficiaries of Federal aid, and leave millions of others subject to discrimination are simply unacceptable. We will also strongly resist attempts by the administration and opponents in Congress to misuse this important legislative initiative as an excuse to cut back on the protections of prior law.

Twenty years ago it was common practice for Federal aid to be used to support racially segregated schools and medical facilities. Women were systematically excluded from professional schools. And scant attention was paid to the special needs of the disabled and senior citizens. Today, because of these statutes and Federal efforts to enforce them, substantial progress has been made. Further progress will not be possible unless we act to restore the full force and effect of the laws prohibiting bias because of race, sex, age, or handicap. That is our goal and intention.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 431

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, today I rise proudly with the Senator from Massachusetts and a bipartisan coalition of my colleagues to introduce the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985.

I believe that passage of the legislation we introduce today will be an important event in the historic struggle of the American people to bring all of our citizens—black and white, old and young, women and men, the handicapped and the able bodied—into full enjoyment of their God-given, inalienable rights. Previous generations of Americans have fought wars for that ideal. And we have fought and are still fighting against racism, sexism, and the attitudes that stereotype elderly and handicapped and relegate them to second-class citizenship. The American agenda includes more than budgets and tax cuts and national defense: it includes defense of the ideals which have made us great.

In order to give substance to those ideals, the Congress passed the four historic civil rights statutes: The Civil Rights Act of 1964; title IX, dealing with sex discrimination in education; section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act; and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975. As the pillars of our civil rights policy, they pledge that "no person shall * * * be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination" in federally assisted programs on the basis of race, sex, handicap, or age. Those prohibitions, and the enforcement language which follows in the statutes, represent the most powerful tools available to us for ending discrimination and establishing civil rights. We act today to reaffirm our ideals by restoring those tools.

The Supreme Court, in Grove City versus Bell and other decisions, has wrongly interpreted what Congress clearly intended to do in those statutes. By narrowing the meaning of the term program or activity which occurs in nearly identical form in the four statutes, the Court has contracted the scope of coverage of these laws. Legislative history and subsequent administrative practice make clear that the Congress intended that entire institutions receiving Federal assistance are subject to scrutiny under the four statutes. Congress wanted to send a message: that there will be no Federal subsidy for discrimination. If some want to go ahead and discriminate, they must do it with their own resources, not with the taxpayers money.

It is therefore necessary at this point for the Congress to reassert what our intent was and is with respect to these four statutes, all of which use nearly identical program or activity language. In an attempt to address concerns raised about last year's version of this legislation, S. 2568, a simpler, cleaner approach has been adopted. This legislation provides a definition for the language narrowed by the Court to restore its original breadth and effect.

The definition of the term recipient, which was the core of S. 2568 and was used in lieu of the term "program or activity" is not included in this year's bill. Instead the term program or activity is explicitly defined. The legislation we introduce today sets out three important standards for determining coverage under the four statutes:

First, when a State or local government agency or department receives Federal funds, the entire agency or department is covered.

Second, when a university, higher education system, local education agency, or other elementary and secondary school system receives Federal funds, the entire entity is covered.

Third, when a corporation, partnership, or other private organization receives Federal funds, the entire entity is covered.

The same institutionwide principles used to determine coverage for the State and local government, educational institution and corporate categories are also used to determine coverage for any entity which does not fit one of these three categories.

The bill also makes clear that when a State or local government receives Federal financial assistance for distribution to agencies, only that unit—for example, the Governor's office—to which the funds were extended, and those agencies that actually receive funds, would be covered.

These standards are the sponsors' conception of what Congress originally intended and what was prior practice before Grove City.

The bill also includes last year's amendment to the enforcement sections of the four statutes which is designed to ensure that the pinpointed fund termination remedy is retained.

I am encouraged, Mr. President, by the fact that our majority leader has indicated that a civil rights bill of this kind is one of his top priorities for this session, his first as leader. He is part of a great tradition in the Republican party, stretching from Lincoln to the present day. Indeed, the passage of these historical civil rights statutes was due in no small part to our former colleagues Jacob Javits and Edward Brooke; three of these four statutes were signed into law by Republican Presidents. I welcome the cosponsorship of nine fellow Republicans in this effort. It is my hope, Mr. President, that we can move forward in a bipartisan spirit to address this urgent domestic priority.

Mr. President, the historic American march toward a society of freedom for all and equal opportunity stopped, in effect, when the Grove City decision was handed down. Congress must act to remedy that situation. The America that could be and to which we all aspire, suffers by our inaction. With the passage of this bill, the march resumes where it left off.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am proud to join the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER], and Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] as one of the principal sponsors of the proposed "Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985." We are joined as principal sponsors by the Senators from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], and Vermont [Mr. LEAHY and Mr. STAFFORD]. Thirty-seven other Members of the Senate, representing both sides of the aisle, are cosponsoring this bill, the companion to H.R. 700, which on January 24 was introduced in the House of Representatives by my good friends and colleagues from California, Representative GUS HAWKINS and Representative DON EDWARDS, along with Representatives JAMES JEFFORDS and HAMILTON FISH, who are joined by a bipartisan group of 58 cosponsors.

INTRODUCTION

Mr. President, this legislation represents a truly nonpartisan effort to reiterate and reinforce our shared commitment to securing broad opportunities for all persons to participate in our society without being subjected to unjust discrimination. It is intended to restore the strength and vitality of four basic civil rights statutes—title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975—which were designed to guarantee that Federal funds would not be provided to entities which discriminate on the basis of race, color, national origin, sex, disability, or age. I was privileged to be involved in the development of the latter three of these statutes as a member of the Labor Committee in the seventies.

The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 is about one issue, and one issue only—discrimination.

The question is whether funds of the Government of the United States should be used to support discrimination against various classes of individuals in our society. My answer is no.

Many of us thought we had answered that question once and for all with enactment of these civil rights laws.

It is very unfortunate that Congress must revisit these issues. But the Supreme Court's erroneous decision on February 28, 1984, in the case of Grove City College versus Bell, which I will describe in detail in a few moments, allows the rebuilding of walls of discrimination where Congress had torn them down years ago. Congress had made it the law of the land that Federal financial assistance carries with it the legal duty not to discriminate on grounds of race, color, national origin, sex, handicap, or age. But, the decision in the Grove City case permits a college to receive Federal subsidies, in the form of student grants, that can be used in any or all of the college's departments and offices while leaving the college free to discriminate in all of its operations except its student aid office.

That was a novel, surprisingly narrow interpretation and an ominous precedent that threatens to restrict severely the coverage of the four major civil rights laws. The Supreme Court's holding and rationale in the Grove City case regarding the scope of title IX have already been applied by the Court in a handicap discrimination case, Consolidated Rail Corp. versus Darrone, known as the Conrail case, decided under section 504 on the same day as Grove City.

Our bill is designed to lift from the civil rights laws of our land the dark shadow cast by the Court's decisions and opinions in these two cases and the 1982 North Haven case and by the actions of the present administration in reliance on them. Our aim is to restore the enforcement of these statutes to the scope and force that existed under the previous administrations of Presidents Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter, two Republicans and two Democrats.

Mr. President, the decisions issued on February 28 do not spell out all the possible implications of the Grove City decision's exceedingly narrow construction of student aid as Federal financial assistance for purposes of civil rights law coverage purposes. What those decisions clearly have done, however, is create confusion, provide an excuse for this administration to continue its efforts to emasculate civil rights enforcement activities, and pave the way for a great deal more, protracted litigation.

Although the February 28 decisions touch directly only on title IX and section 504, they cast a dark and ominous shadow over the scope of the other two major civil rights statutes—title VI and the Age Discrimination Act. Both these statutes contain language almost identical to that utilized in title IX and section 504. In the past, they have been applied and enforced in a similar manner. The individual responsible for the current administration's policies with respect to enforcement of civil rights laws—William Bradford Reynolds, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights—has indicated his view that the same policies applicable to title IX should be applied to enforcement of other nondiscrimination laws.

Spurred on by its anti-civil-rights victory in Grove City, the administration moved swiftly to implement its interpretation of the Supreme Court's decisions. For example, the Department of Education, which initially took steps to dismiss numerous pending sex and other discrimination complaints against education institutions on the grounds that the Department no longer had authority to proceed in them, is now holding in limbo approximately 40 cases under title IX, 13 under section 504, 2 under the Age Discrimination Act, and 4 under title VI.

It takes little imagination to foresee what other actions this administration will be taking to bring its civil rights enforcement activities—already so wanting—to a grinding halt.

In this context, Mr. President, the Grove City decision constitutes a tremendous setback for our efforts to ensure that all persons receive equal opportunities, irrespective of race, color, national origin, sex, disability, or age.

EFFORTS IN THE 98TH CONGRESS

Mr. President, immediately following the February 28, 1984, decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in the Grove City case, legislation, S. 2363, which I cosponsored, was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD]. That bill was designed to reverse, with respect to title IX only, the holding in that case narrowing the scope of title IX. As I have noted, on the same day that the Court handed down the decision in the Grove City case regarding title IX, it indicated in the Conrail case that the rationale in the Grove City case with respect to the scope of title IX is equally applicable to handicap discrimination outlawed by section 504, of which I had been a principal Senate author. Thus, on March 8, joined by Senators STAFFORD, RIEGLE, and DODD, I introduced a bill, S. 2399, to reverse the aspect of the Conrail case making the restrictive Grove City reasoning applicable to section 504.

Concurrently, a number of us in both the House and Senate began work on a single measure to cover all four major civil rights statutes, not just the two statutes explicitly involved in the February 28 decisions.

That more comprehensive measure, of which I was pleased to be a principal sponsor, was introduced in the House and Senate on April 12, 1984, as H.R. 5490 and S. 2568, respectively. It was sponsored by 63 Members of the Senate with strong support from both sides of the aisle. In the House, support for the bill culminated in its passage on June 26 with an overwhelming bipartisan vote of 375 to 32. In the Senate, consideration was blocked by a handful of ardent opponents. In the closing days of the 98th Congress, after it had proved impossible to move the bill through the committee process, an effort was made to attach a modified version of S. 2568—amendment No. 5508—as a floor amendment to the must-pass fiscal year 1985 continuing resolution, House Joint Resolution 648. Despite initial victories in procedural test votes, the opponents, with the assistance of the former majority leader, were able to block the Senate from considering the legislation on its merits. At various points, efforts were made to break apart the coalition of civil rights organizations supporting the legislation by so-called compromise measures which—to note only two of their many flaws—would have affected only title IX or would have been limited to educational institutions alone, thereby not ensuring that other entities receiving Federal funds would be precluded from discriminating in various aspects of their operations.

Mr. President, these so-called compromises were unacceptable to the supporters of the 1984 legislation, both those inside and outside the Senate. We saw them for what they were—half-measures that, given the stated views of the administration now charged with civil rights enforcement and the unfortunate predilection of the Supreme Court toward narrow, twisted reading of these laws, would likely have left millions of Americans subject to unjust discrimination where the Congress had originally intended them to be protected.

RENEWED EFFORTS IN THE 99TH CONGRESS

Over the past several months, intensive deliberations have taken place to draft a new legislative proposal that would successfully withstand the spurious attacks that were launched against the 1984 civil rights bill in a concentrated effort to undercut the broad base of support which exists in this body and in the House and throughout this great Nation for our basic civil rights laws.

Mr. President, that broad base of support does exist. It is more than 20 years since the passage of title VI of the Civil Rights Act and a decade since enactment of the most recent of the four statutes, the Age Discrimination Act. These laws have worked. All Americans have benefited from a society where segregation and discrimination are not acceptable, and where the moral and legal force of our institutions, from the Federal Government down, is aligned against those who would drag us backward to the dark pages of our history where bigotry and prejudice were tolerated, by law and by custom.

Last year, we saw the forces that have persistently opposed this progress attempt to stir up every conceivable, groundless charge, ignite every possible fear, and drag every preposterous spectre across the path of the 1984 civil rights bill. Tragically, those tactics succeeded in delaying

Senate consideration of this important legislation until it became possible for the opponents to block its consideration on the merits in the closing hours of the 98th Congress. But what they won was only a delay. It was not a victory. They stopped the Senate last year from voting on that measure, but they failed to undermine the principle or our commitment to it.

I do not believe that those tactics will prevail again. This Senate will have the opportunity to stand up and record its vote on this issue. And it will, I am convinced, reaffirm the scope and strength of our Nation's commitment to civil rights.

Mr. President, we have struggled too long and we have traveled too far to allow a handful of individuals and organizations to turn back the clock on civil rights. Our Nation was founded on a dream of opportunity. It is a dream that must live for all Americans, not just for some.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS AND OPINIONS

Mr. President, as section 2(1) of the bill would express as a congressional finding, "[C]ertain aspects of recent decisions and opinions of the Supreme Court have unduly narrowed or cast doubt upon the broad application of" the four major civil rights laws affected by this legislation. The three cases involved are North Haven Board of Education v. Bell, 456 U.S. 512 (1982), Grove City College v. Bell, 104 S. Ct. 1211 (1984), and Consolidated Rail Corp. v. Darrone, 104 S. Ct. 1248 (1984). Strangely, there is much that is good about the holdings and some parts of the opinions in these cases; there is also, in my opinion, some inexplicable lines of reasoning, analysis, and dictum. I will at a later date explain in detail where I believe the decisions and opinions are well founded and where I take exception to them.

PROGRESS UNDER THE FEDERAL CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS: TITLE VI

Mr. President, since the passage of title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, we have seen enormous strides in eliminating unjust discrimination from our society. Just 20 years ago, many federally assisted programs still allowed segregated services and facilities. Many Federal agencies had played little or no part in the struggle against race discrimination. Prior to that time, Federal dollars went into the construction and operation of totally segregated schools. Federal funds were distributed to a host of programs which openly practiced discrimination against black Americans. Title VI has served as a strong and effective toll in bringing an end to these invidious practices.

TITLE IX

Title VI provided the model for passage of title IX of the Education Act of 1972 which forbids discrimination in education on the basis of sex. Like title VI, title IX has led to a tremendous change in the way educational institutions have dealt with students.

It is fair to say that before title IX was enacted, discrimination against women was widespread at virtually every level in education. Women were excluded from admission to publicly supported institutions, barred from certain courses of study, and denied equal access to financial aid and the full range of educational opportunities. Negative stereotypes prevailed to limit the potential career choices of many female students. Educational counselors routinely steered female students away from male-dominated fields, regardless of the aptitudes, abilities, or desires of those students.

In the past decade, steady progress has been made in the struggle to overcome the barriers and prejudices that have served to deny women equal access to educational opportunities. Women have made gains in virtually every area, and our society has been greatly enriched by the contributions they have made as they have entered new fields in increasing numbers.

As a member of the Subcommittee on Education of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee in 1972 and a Senate conferee on the Education Amendments of 1972 in which title IX was enacted, I have had a longstanding and firm commitment to this law which has led to such significant changes in educational opportunities for women. I am proud to have helped bring about its enactment, and I am determined not to stand by and see its strength eroded away by an administration with no commitment to its goals.

Similarly, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 has opened the doors previously used to shut out disabled Americans. Section 504 was enacted to ensure that recipients of Federal assistance deal fairly and reasonably with disabled individuals who are seeking to participate more fully in our society and in the activities of our commercial, professional, recreational, social, and governmental institutions.

In 1972, as a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee and its Subcommittee on the Handicapped, I was honored when Senator Jennings Randolph, the chairman of the subcommittee, asked me, then a very junior Senator, to serve as chairman of the subcommittee for purposes of reviewing and revising the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. In the course of that year, I chaired 5 days of hearings, filling 2,611 pages of hearing records, covering an enormous range of problems facing disabled persons and their opportunities for rehabilitation, work, and participation in society. The legislative product, the Rehabilitation Act of 1972, was pocket vetoed by President Nixon on October 27, 1972, It had contained the forerunner of section 504, crafted with me by my great friend from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), our indefatigable colleague from New York [Mr. Javits], and, of course, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Randolph].

In early 1973, after additional hearings in January and February of that year, we introduced, and passed rapidly through both Houses, very similar legislation, which President Nixon again vetoed—on March 27, 1973.

The legislation ultimately agreed upon—the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Public Law 93-112—was enacted on September 26, 1973, with section 504 intact along with numerous other civil rights provisions in title V of that act—affecting employment of handicapped individuals by Federal contractors and subcontractors and by the Federal Government itself, as well as architectural and transportation barriers.

It soon became clear that section 504 needed more than the 46 words it originally contained, and Senator Randolph asked me to complete the work I had begun in 1972. I chaired the subcommittee through an additional hearing and markup, and we produced the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1974—Public Law 93-516—which, among other provisions, enacted in section 7 of the act the definition of "handicapped individual" which has provided the foundation for application and enforcement of section 504.

Also, as I noted earlier, in 1978 the Congress enacted in Public Law 95-602 further changes I proposed with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] to enhance the ability of handicapped individuals to obtain compliance with section 504 and the other civil rights provisions in title V of the Rehabilitation Act. These amendments authorized the award of attorneys' fees to handicapped persons who prevail in suits to enforce the provisions of title V and made the Civil Rights Act title VI remedies, procedures, and rights available with respect to section 504 violations.

In enacting title V of the Rehabilitation Act, and the 1974 and 1978 strengthening amendments, Congress recognized that much of the discrimination facing disabled individuals is not the inevitable result of their handicapping conditions, but rather, arises out of the false perceptions and prejudices that others hold about individuals who have those conditions. Congress also saw that a wide-scale prohibition against discrimination was needed in moving toward the ultimate goal—the integration of handicapped persons into all aspects of America. Title V not only addresses the need to eliminate tangible barriers but also prohibits the continuation of discriminatory policies and practices that are based on stereotypical and prejudicial perceptions about the abilities, potential, and needs of handicapped adults and children.

As a result of the enactment of section 504 and the 1974 and 1978 amendments, the attitudinal and physical barriers which have served so unfairly to deprive disabled persons of the rights and opportunities that should be each American's due have begun to come down. Again, over the past decade since passage of this fundamental civil rights law, substantial progress has been made, and in the process we have begun to see more clearly that disabled Americans have great energy, talents, aspirations, and sensitivities.

AGE DISCRIMINATION ACT

Finally, as a member of the Aging Subcommittee and the conference committee on the legislation, I was privileged to play a major role in the drafting of the most recent of these statutes, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975. This statute reflects the growing awareness in our Nation of another form of bias—age discrimination. The negative stereotypes and biases which have served to deny older Americans the opportunity to participate and contribute to the continuing growth of our society must, like other forms of discrimination, also be put behind us if we are ever to achieve the freedom and opportunity for every individual that our country symbolizes. The Age Discrimination Act represents our national commitment to put an end to unreasonable age discrimination as well.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BILL

Mr. President, the adverse aspects of the Court's holding in the Grove City case turned principally upon the Court's narrow application of the term "program or activity" in title IX. Section 901 of title IX prohibits sex-based discrimination "under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." The Court in Grove City construed those words in a very limited sense—and, in my view, a way totally at variance both with common sense and congressional intent.

Therefore, our bill seeks, as did S. 2568 last year, to reverse the effects of that aspect of that decision and to restore the prior broad scope of coverage and administrative application that the Court erroneously invalidated.

COVERAGE

However, this year's bill does so in a more easily understood, straightforward manner. Last year, S. 2568 would have deleted the term "program or activity" from the four civil rights statutes and replaced it with the term "recipient" defined along the lines of the definitions of that term in the implementing regulations. But that change in the wording of the statutes and the complicated wording of the definition raised unnecessary complexities that allowed the opponents of restoring the law's vitality to raise many questions based on the proposed new terminology.

This year's bill leaves the term "program or activity" in place in the four statutory prohibitions against discrimination and adds to each of the statutes a broad institution-wide definition of that term that would overturn the Court's narrow interpretation.

The proposed definition is simple and clear. It sets out three important standards for determining coverage under these laws that are consistent with the coverage of the statutes as applied by previous administrations.

First, when an agency or department of a State or local government receives Federal funds, the entire agency or department would be covered.

Second, when a university, higher education system, local education agency, or other elementary and secondary school system receives Federal funds, the entire entity would be covered, including any administrative body, such as a board of education.

Third, when a corporation, partnership, or other private organization receives Federal funds, the entire entity would be covered.

The same institution-wide principles used to determine coverage for the State and local government, educational institution, and corporate categories would also be used to determine coverage for any entity which does not fit one of these three categories.

The bill would also make clear that, in a case in which assistance is extended to a State government or to a local government, rather than directly to an agency or department thereof, the unit—for example, the Governor's office—to which the funds are extended as well as the agencies and other entities that actually receive funds would all be covered.

FUND TERMINATION

Finally, the bill contains the same amendments as were proposed in last year's bill to the "pinpointing" language in the fund-termination provisions of title IX, the Age Discrimination Act, and title VI—which, under section 505(a)(2) of the Rehabilitation Act, applies to section 504 violations. Thus, in the case of each statute, the reference to a "particular program, or part thereof"—which in the Age Discrimination Act alone also includes "or activity"—is deleted and, in its stead, language would be inserted to limit fund terminations to the Federal financial assistance that is determined to "support the noncompliance" that is found to be occurring. The statutory scheme would thus retain the basic concept of "pinpointing," that is, limiting the termination of funds to those funds which have a specific nexus to the discrimination that is found.

PROCEDURAL SAFEGUARDS RETAINED

Mr. President, I want to emphasize that, in the case of both of the categories of changes that our bill would make in the four laws, our intention has been to restore the law to the general shape it was originally intended to have and until recently did have under the practices of each of the four prior administrations charged with their implementation. I would also note that all of the existing procedural safeguards that the four laws provide before Federal funds may be terminated—the Government's initial duty to attempt resolution of the violation through conciliation, notice to the recipient of any adverse finding, opportunity for hearing, 30 days' advance notice to the congressional committees with responsibility for the laws under which the funds were provided, and the right to judicial review of any decision to terminate funding—are retained without change.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, these four basic civil rights statutes are integral parts of our national commitment to the concept and achievement of equal justice and opportunity. We must act to ensure that this national antidiscrimination policy and our progress in implementing it is not undercut and diminished by the Supreme Court's erroneous opinions and decisions in the three cases and the Reagan administration's sweeping applications of them.

It is vital that Congress act to reaffirm longstanding policy that recipients of Federal funding refrain from engaging in invidious and unjust discrimination. We have come too far along the long, arduous path toward a fair and just society to allow progress in the area of civil rights to be undermined.

The work that was left undone in the Senate in the closing days of the 98th Congress must be swiftly completed. I urge all of my colleagues to give this bill their careful consideration and, ultimately, their support.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I join with the Senators from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] and Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and with many other Senators, to introduce one of the most important bills yet presented to the 99th Congress—the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985.

Recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court—most notably last year's ruling in the case of Grove City College versus Bell—have set back the enforcement of our national policy of eliminating unfair discrimination. The legislation we introduce today is designed to overcome the crippling effects of those decisions, and to renew and reinvigorate our pledge to members of racial minorities, to women, to the handicapped, and to the elderly, that the Federal taxes that they pay will never be used to support invidious discrimination against them.

The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will correct the narrow interpretation that the recent court decisions have imposed on title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments. It also forestalls similarly restrictive readings of the statute on which title IX is based—title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act—and of the laws prohibiting Federal support for discrimination based on age or handicap, both of which are also derived from title VI. Enactment of this measure will restore the longstanding administrative practice under all these statutes, which provides that the entire institution that receives assistance from Federal tax dollars, and not simply the specific component that directly receives the funds, has a duty to refrain from illegal discrimination.

As a rule it is not particularly difficult to draft legislation intended to clarify the interpretation of a single phrase—program or activity—appearing in a handful of Federal laws. The history of this legislation demonstrates that this rule, like any other, has its exceptions. The Senate never had an opportunity to vote on the Civil Rights Act of 1984, which was introduced shortly after the Grove City decision. An amendment embodying its text was offered to the continuing resolution in the last days of the 98th Congress, but was caught in the legislative logjam that clogged our calendar last October.

This legislation is not fundamentally different from last year's civil rights bill. But to the extent it is different, this year's bill is a better bill. It is clearer. It is simpler. And it is more sharply focused on the task at hand. That task is to restore the original congressional intent to forbid the use of tax dollars to subsidize discrimination against women, against racial minorities, or against the handicapped, or the elderly. As part of that task, we must correct the course taken by the Supreme Court in some of its recent decisions—most notably in the Grove City case—and put the Federal Government back on the track of vigorous enforcement of the civil rights laws.

The new majority leader has targeted deficit reduction as his primary goal for the 99th Congress. I agree with his evaluation of the challenge before us. But I would add that a focus on deficit reduction is fully consistent with active support for the restoration of broad civil rights coverage. In fact, if we are going to tighten up on Federal spending, it is doubly important to insure that every American has an equal chance to participate in federally assisted programs, and that no American is excluded because of race, gender, age, or handicap. The Federal Government can no longer afford to tolerate discrimination in any program or activity that is assisted by tax dollars. We need the Civil Rights Restoration Act because we must make sure that the equality of sacrifice that deficit reduction will demand does not become a sacrifice of equality.

I believe that the Senate leadership shares this view, and that there is general agreement in the Senate that a legislative response to the Grove City decision is needed. The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 offers the most comprehensive and effective response, and I call on my fellow Senators to join in support of it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today to join Senator KENNEDY and Senator WEICKER as a principal sponsor of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. I am pleased to report that this bill accomplishes the same objectives we sought in 1984: Elimination of the Federal subsidy of discrimination.

Passage of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will ensure that discrimination is prohibited by the recipients of Federal financial assistance. That has always been the goal of the proponents of legislation to restore and revitalize the civil rights statutes that were weakened by recent Supreme Court decisions, most notably the Grove City College versus Bell decision on February 28, 1984.

Congress will pass the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 this year. The Congress must recommit itself to its original intent in passing antidiscrimination laws during the past 20 years: That receipt of Federal financial assistance will trigger institutionwide coverage of civil rights statutes.

On one day in 1984, two decades of civil rights progress was severely restricted by the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Grove City College versus Bell. Our job in 1985 is to clarify and reaffirm the law so that no one can say, ever again, that one individual or one group has an unfair advantage over another.

Today, I am sponsoring legislation to restore four major civil rights statutes: Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act, as amended in 1978, and the Age Discrimination Act [ADA] of 1975. These statutes together ensure that discrimination is prohibited by the recipients of Federal financial assistance.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is the basic guarantor of civil rights in this country. Its purpose is to effectively prohibit discrimination in employment, public accommodations, education, and federally assisted programs. All subsequent civil rights statutes were built on these guarantees, correcting any omissions to this grand decision.

The cornerstone of the 1964 act is title VI, prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of race, color, or national origin in "any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." Calling for its enactment, President Kennedy was eloquent: "Simple justice requires that public funds, to which all taxpayers of all races contribute, not be spent in any fashion which encourages, entrenches, subsidizes or results in racial discrimination * * *" Enforcement efforts have resulted in ending discrimination in education, State and local governments, and a variety of institutions that receive Federal funding.

Title VI has become the model both in language and remedial approach for the civil rights statutes that followed. In 1972, rectifying a major omission in title VI, Congress enacted title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments. Because title VI's coverage excludes sex as a forbidden classification, title IX is essential to outlaw discrimination on the grounds of sex "under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." Title IX has been credited with securing educational rights for women that had not heretofore existed. It was certainly Congress' intent that title IX be accorded the same broad interpretation that had been given title VI—thus, the tracking of the very language used to secure those critical protections.

So, too, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 followed the same model. In that legislation, Congress included the disabled under the antidiscrimination rubric. Referring to title VI, our ultimate exemplar, we again used the program or activity language.

Finally, in 1975, we went to the well another time, patterning the Age Discrimination Act on the grounds of age by "any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." In every case, our intent has been expansion of the protections of the original Civil Rights Act.

Unfortunately, on February 28, 1984, the Supreme Court in Grove City College versus Bell opted for a severely limited interpretation of title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments. The Court held that only the "program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance," rather than an entire institution, is subject to title IX strictures. In this case, only the financial aid program of Grove City College—and no other part of the institution—is prohibited from discrimination on the basis of sex. In an instant, the broad scope we intended was abrogated.

The decision is particularly troubling on its terms since discrimination in education is subtle but pernicious, affecting its victims for the entirety of their lives. The absurdity of the result is apparent. It is of little use to bar discrimination in the financial aid program of an institution if a woman cannot gain admittance to, or participate in, the institution because of its other discriminatory policies and practices. It is equally of little use to bar discrimination in employment if a woman cannot attain the necessary education to obtain that employment. Our purpose in enacting title IX was to ensure that Federal resources could not be used to support discriminatory practices against women and that those practices would cease to exit—a precise parallel to President Kennedy's purpose in urging the passage of title VI.

But even more horrifying than Grove City's title IX interpretation is the decision's staggering legacy. Not only has the Supreme Court substantially undercut the efficacy of title IX, but the decision's precedential value with respect to title VI, section 504, and the Age Discrimination Act cannot be overstated. If title IX is program-specific in effect, the other statutes, worded identically, are likely to suffer a similar analysis. Indeed, in the past year since the Court handed down its decision, the Department of Justice has moved forward on that basis in its so-called enforcement endeavors.

Now in 1985—21 years after the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, it is time to recommit ourselves to its purposes. Fortunately, the Supreme Court's opinion is easily corrected. The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will clarify our original intentions regarding all four statutes: That receipt of Federal financial assistance will trigger institutionwide coverage. Lest any critic question our remedial approach, however, the bill will also clarify that only the particular assistance supporting noncompliance will be subject to termination.

Exciting testimony to the last 21 years of civil rights enforcement activities is the unified coalition that supports this legislation. Advocacy organizations representing minorities, women, the disabled, and the elderly have joined forces behind the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. This must be evidence that the efforts of the past 21 years are reaping rewards. The broad-based support justifies the broad interpretation we intended for these laws. I thank this coalition for their effort and call on all Members of Congress, and the administration, too, to unite behind this bipartisan bill, enact it speedily, and make 1985 the year we restore antidiscrimination laws forever.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I join my colleagues, Senator KENNEDY and Senator WEICKER, in cosponsoring the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. This legislation is one of the most important bills we will have the opportunity to consider during this Congress. If enacted, this bill will reverse the erroneous decisions of the Supreme Court in the Grove City decision, and certain other Court opinions, which undercut basic civil rights protections.

In the Grove City decision, the Supreme Court misinterpreted the intent of Congress in enacting title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Each of those statutes is based on a simple but powerful principle—Federal funds should not be used to support discriminatory activity.

By interpreting title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 to mean that a college could continue to discriminate in all its programs other than the financial aids program, even though the college benefited from Federal grants to students, the Supreme Court took an exceedingly narrow view of the coverage of that statute. Congress did not intend to hamstring enforcement of the civil rights laws in such a drastic way.

This legislation reverses that decision and makes clear that financial assistance to a university or a system of higher education means that entire university or system is subject to the Federal ban on discrimination.

Because the Supreme Court also indicated that other statutues with a similar purpose and enforcement mechanism would also be interpreted in the same narrow way, the bill makes clear that the same principle should apply when funds are provided to other types of institutions and when the prohibitions in these other statutes are interpreted by the courts.

The bill makes clear that Federal financial assistance to a State or local department or agency means the entire agency or department is subject to the ban on discrimination in all four of the statutes I mentioned earlier. Similarly, when financial assistance is provided to a corporation, partnership or private organization, the entire corporation, partnership, or private organization is subject to the prohibition on discrimination. Similar principles will apply to local educational agencies and other types of entities.

These principles are not only sound policy, but they reflect the understanding of officials who had responsibility for interpreting and implementing these statutes. It is true that in some cases it is difficult to identify precisely how particular situations would have been interpreted prior to the Grove City decision. In an effort to make congressional intent clear to the courts, the bill states basic principles as clearly as possible. In all cases, however, the bill restates closely prior enforcement practice. In short, the bill provides clarity for the courts and enforcement agencies while faithfully restating the understanding and implementation of these statutes prior to the Grove City decision.

During the last Congress the opponents of the Civil Rights Act of 1984 used the strategy of conjuring up complex hypothetical situations and demanding that the proponents of the bill show conclusively prior enforcement practice with respect to each situation. I am frank to say that, in some situations, that cannot be done. On the other hand, I am frank to say that such a tactic diverts our attention from the fundamental issue—restoring the strength and effectiveness of the civil rights laws. That is the task before us. We will only find an excuse not to act if we insist on resolving every conceivable question that may arise under these statutes.

The public is entitled to demand that we act responsibly and quickly on this legislation, in particular, the groups in the public that look to Congress for protection from discrimination—the aged, minorities, the handicapped and women. They demand action, not excuses.

I am confident that when this bill is fully debated in this body, the overwhelming majority of the Senate will decide to support this legislation and restore the civil rights protections that have made our Nation a fairer and more just society.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I have cosponsored and strongly support the Civil Rights Restoration Act introduced today. Through the years a great deal of progress has been achieved for women and minorities as a result of the civil rights laws enacted by Congress. As a nation we must continue to discourage discrimination and continue to open opportunities for all our citizens. The Supreme Court's decision in Grove City threatens the progress we have achieved, especially for women, and we must put an end to that threat. The bill that has been introduced today, the Civil Rights Restoration Act will overturn the Supreme Court's decision and will prohibit discrimination against women and minorities by institutions receiving Federal funds.

Unless we act now, colleges and universities voluntarily accepting financial assistance provided by the Federal Government will be free to discriminate, as some have done in the past against women. Absent the passage of this bill, the expanding opportunities only recently made available to women in athletics, vocational and professional training and in other areas would be endangered.

During the last session of Congress, the opponents of the Civil Rights Act of 1985 in the Senate raised numerous objections and effectively eliminated any chance that the bill would pass the Senate. Many of that bill's proponents, including myself, have worked hard to redraft this important piece of legislation to address the concerns of the bill's opponents and to ensure that the Supreme Court's incorrect decision be overturned.

For nearly 20 years, every administration has interpreted the civil rights laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race, sex, national origin, handicapping condition and age as having broad coverage and application. With the passage of the Civil Rights Restoration Act we can insure that the civil rights laws of this Nation will have their intended broad impact, and we can continue the essential progress toward assuring full opportunities for women and minorities.

Mr. CHAFEE. I am pleased to join Senators WEICKER, MATHIAS, and KENNEDY in introducing the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. Legislation to strengthen our Nation's civil rights laws remains the major unfinished business of the 98th Congress.

It is fitting that the drive for civil rights should occupy a prominent place on Congress' agenda. Indeed, few other endeavors have consumed so much of our national energies during the past 100 years. The civil rights debate has accentuated both the strengths and weaknesses of our national character. Each civil rights victory has been hard fought, and the quest for equality has enriched our society.

Civil rights means equal opportunity—for blacks as well as whites, for the old as well as the young, for women as well as men. Those who fought so hard for the landmark civil rights bills of the past generation wrote these laws to be inclusive, not exclusive. They painted with a broad brush, for their purpose was to reach out to all.

Last year, we learned once again that vigilance is the watchword if we are to protect the gains which have been made. The Supreme Court, in its Grove City decision adopted a narrow interpretation of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. In enacting title IX, Congress clearly intended to guarantee equal access by both sexes to the programs and activities of federally supported institutions.

The Court's decision limited the Government's ability to enforce civil rights laws in federally supported institutions by applying sanctions only to the specific program affected—college athletics, for instance—rather than to the entire institution. This narrow interpretation compelled action to make clear that institutionwide coverage is triggered by the receipt of Federal financial assistance in any form—not only under title IX but under three other important civil rights laws. And so we set out to clarify this broad scope of coverage to provide institutionwide protection against discrimination based not only upon sex, but upon race, national origin, disability, or age.

Complete equality of opportunity is not yet a reality for all our citizens. No government should establish legalistic barriers that prevent men and women from achieving their full potential. Our business should be to enhance opportunity for all, not to narrow it for the privileged few.

It was extremely unfortunate that our efforts to pass legislation last year became bogged down in a parliamentary muddle. In addition to the procedural difficulties, however, there were some substantive objections to our earlier proposal. It was argued that our amendments to the civil rights statutes did more than clarify their scope of coverage—that our amendments reached beyond original congressional intent and amounted to an effort to change previous regulatory practices.

Last year, we attempted to clarify the scope of civil rights protection in these laws by replacing the term "program or activity" with "recipient." The use of the term "recipient" may have a far broader reach than the existing language. But our objective is to assure that civil rights protections remain as strong as Congress has always intended—not to authorize burdensome new regulations where they don't apply.

The legislation we now propose does not include the term "recipient." Instead it retains the term "program or activity"—the phrase narrowly interpreted by the Court in Grove City—and adds a definition of that term to each of the civil rights statutes. The definition is clear and leaves no doubt that institutionwide coverage is the intent of Congress. This definition is consistent with prior coverage.

First, when a State or local government agency or department receives Federal funds, the entire agency or department is covered.

Second, when a university, higher education system, local education agency, or other elementary and secondary school system receives Federal funds, the entity is covered.

Third, when a corporation, partnership, or other private organization receives Federal funds, the entire entity is covered.

An institution which receives even a single dollar of Federal financial assistance should not be permitted to practice any form of discrimination. In order for our Nation to make continued progress in assuring the equal rights for all citizens, we must act promptly to clarify the broad scope of coverage intended for these statutes.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title IX have opened doors to groups in our society whose aspirations and opportunities had previously been limited.

But these four statutes have helped our Nation make significant strides in eliminating discrimination in a variety of important areas. Now is not the time to turn back.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, as a Member of the House of Representatives, I was one of the principal sponsors of the Civil Rights Act of 1984. Although last year, the House overwhelming passed H.R. 5490, by a vote of 375-32, the Senate was unable to complete work on that bill or its own version before the end of the 98th Congress.

This year's bill seeks the same result we sought to achieve in 1984—the restoration of four major civil rights statutes—title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discriminaton Act of 1975—to the broad scope of coverage which the Supreme Court in Grove City College versus Bell erroneously invalidated.

To achieve this goal, each of the four laws is amended—and they are amended in exactly the same way. However, in order to answer the criticism that S. 2568 was too complex, and therefore unclear, we have taken a different approach this year.

This year's bill defines the term "program or activity." It leaves intact existing definitions of recipient. The definition of "program or activity," which sets forth the scope of coverage is simple and clear. One must only look to the face of the statute to determine its parameters. It incorporates the same broad scope of coverage of these laws which existed prior to the Supreme Court's decision. Thus, when any part of a college, university, system of higher education, or local school district is extended Federal financial assistance then all of the operations of that college, university, system of higher education or local school district are required to comply with the nondiscrimination provisions of these laws. This principle also applies to a corporation, partnership, or other organization receiving Federal assistance, that is, any part of a corporation, partnership, or other organization extended assistance results in coverage of the entire corporation, partnership, or organization.

For example, if this legislation were the law of the land and the Supreme Court had before it the exact same set of facts presented in Grove City College versus Bell, it would determine that Grove City College was the recipient and the "program or activity" receiving the basic educational opportunity grants [Pell grants] was the college.

If Grove City College received no Federal student assistance, but the college's department of physical sciences applied for and received a grant from the National Science Foundation, then under this bill, all of the operations of the college would be covered because part of its operations was extended Federal financial assistance. Thus, discrimination anywhere in the college could be investigated and compliance could be effected throughout the college because the coverage is program-wide, as defined in this bill. Furthermore, Federal financial assistance could be terminated if it was determined that the funds supported the discrimination found.

If Grove City College's Peter Q. Prof, an adjunct professor of humanities, applied for and received a grant from the Department of Education's Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education [FIPSE], and he simply used Grove City College's post office for receipt of his mailings (including grant checks from FIPSE), are all of the operations of Dr. Prof or Grove City College the program or activity which must comply with the antidiscrimination provisions? Under these facts, Dr. Prof would be the recipient of Federal financial assistance. Although he would be covered, the college would not because Dr. Prof's grant activities are unrelated to the college, and thus, not part of the operations of the college.

Would the program or activity be the college or the professor, if in performing the FIPSE grant, Dr. Prof used Grove City College facilities, research assistants, materials and supplies and the college had fiscal control of the grant funds and it received a portion of the grant funds for overhead? Under such facts, Dr. Prof would be considered part of the operations of the college which was extended Federal financial assistance and the College would be the covered program or activity.

What would be the extent of coverage under this bill if Grove City college were a public institution and part of a statewide system of 4-year colleges or universities administered by a single board of trustees and Grove City was the only campus with students receiving Federal student aid [Pell Grants or Guaranteed Student Loans], that is, would the college or system be the program or activity? Under this bill, since Grove City is part of a "system of higher education" and it has been extended Federal financial assistance then the entire system is covered. Thus, jurisdiction to bring a discrimination complaint at another campus would lie because of the Federal financial assistance extended to the Grove City campus. The Federal financial assistance extended to Grove City could not be terminated unless the assistance supported the discrimination found at the other campus.

As a practical matter, in higher education there are no postsecondary institutions which do not receive some form of Federal financial assistance. Almost all receive direct grants or conduct work under contract with Federal departments artured rationale of stopping title IV dollars at the student aid office door is reversed.

This bill clarifies the scope of coverage when Federal financial assistance is extended to a State or local government. Assistance extended to any part of an agency or department of government means the entire agency or department is required to operate in a nondiscriminatory manner; if the assistance is extended to some other governmental entity [other than a department or agency] which in turn distributes the assistance to some other government entity [including some part of a department or agency] then the distributing entity is covered in its entirety and the receiving entity is covered in its entirety if the receiving entity is part of a department or agency, then the department or agency is covered in its entirety].

The remedial concept of "pinpointing," which requires that the cutoff of Federal funds be pinpointed to the particular assistance supporting the discrimination, is retained. This conforming amendment made to the remedies section of these laws is done to assure continuation of this enforcement practice.

Enactment of this legislation will continue to ensure that Federal funds are never used to subsidize discrimination against any person based on race, national origin, sex, disability or age.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. I believe it is the best approach to assure that the rights of all individuals are protected under the law. This legislation does not expand Government authority. Types of organization currently exempt from the statutes in question would remain exempt. The effect of the legislation would be, simply, to make explicit in major civil rights statutes the protections intended by the Congresses that established them.

Some have labeled supporters of this bill as proponents of unwarranted Government intrusion. I believe this opinion is misguided. In fact, the legislation before us was carefully crafted to address that concern. For example, an establishment that is not a direct beneficiary of Government assistance, but which acts as a conduit to the major benefactor, would continue to be exempt from the coverage of the statutes.

So, for instance, the "Ma & Pa" grocery store that accepts food stamps need not worry that providing this service will bring a whole new range of Federal regulation. The store is acting as a conduit of food stamp aid from the Government to the customers, and will not be subject to Government scrutiny as if an actual aid recipient. Our civil rights statutes are not intended to broaden the Federal Government's jurisdiction to such a degree, and neither is the legislation before us today.

Rather than increasing Federal authority, this bill restores—and let me stress the word "restores"—the authority that was curbed severely by the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Grove City College against Bell. This is power rightfully given the Federal Government in four major civil rights statutes, namely the power to prohibit use of Federal funds to support discrimination on the basis of sex, race, age or physical handicap.

Accepting Federal dollars, taxpayer dollars, is a voluntary decision, and one that carries responsibility. That responsibility is a condition of the transaction. It is not unreasonable to expect that establishments accepting these funds will respect the basic civil rights of Americans. And it is not unreasonable to expect the Federal Government to make sure they do.

Mr. President, last year Congress used its power to protect the innocent from the threat of drunk drivers. In doing so, we moved with the knowledge that some would say Government had gone too far. Because we perceived an overriding need for action on the national level, we did not let that criticism stop us from reducing the fatal risks to millions of people.

Today we are dealing with another grave threat, and one just as damaging. Discrimination cripples. It confines Americans to restrictive stereotypes; it holds them back from economic, intellectual, and social opportunity. It keeps them out of reach of their potential. The harm to individual lives, and to our society as a whole, is immeasurable.

Discrimination is a Federal concern. The National Government has the duty to secure for all Americans the basic rights and liberties guaranteed them by the Constitution. It is a function that must be performed at the national level. Congresses past realized this when they wrote our major civil rights laws, and it is incumbent upon us to protect their initiatives from erosion.

The intent of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 is clear and concise. It holds a State or local government agency or department, educational system, or business who are the major benefactors of Federal financial assistance and in some cases receive millions of American Federal dollars accountable for adhering to existing civil rights laws which have been on the books for 20 years.

The four major civil rights statutes:

Title IX of the Civil Rights Act of 1972 which prohibits racial discrimination and states that the law is enforceable by the termination or refusal to grant Federal dollars to any recipient who has been found guilty of racial discrimination.

Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 ensures handicapped individuals an opportunity to participate in our society without exclusion from that participation, by denial of benefits to, or discrimination against them on the basis of their handicap. Again, those found guilty of discrimination are subject to certain sanctions proscribed in the law.

Age Discrimination Act of 1975 bars discrimination because of age in federally assisted programs. The act was designed to cover any type of enterprise and any age group provided that enterprise or activity is a recipient of Federal funds.

Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin from exclusion from participation, or discriminatory denial of benefits, in any "program or activity" that receives Federal financial assistance.

Clearly, if we are to protect the gains we have made toward eradicating discrimination, Congress must act promptly to clarify any restrictive interpretation of not only title IX, but also title VI, section 504, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975—all of which utilize protections similar or identical to those of title IX.

The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 fulfills the historic commitment of the Federal Government in protecting Civil Rights and outlawing discrimination.

In the words of Hubert Humphrey:

> . . . It was once said that the moral test of government is how that government treats those who are in the dawn of life, the children; those who are in the twilight of life, the elderly; and those who are in the shadows of life, the sick, the needy and the handicapped.—Hubert Humphrey, November 1, 1977.

The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 confers the terms that are necessary in order to achieve the original intent of Congress. It addresses the court decision limiting the impact or prohibition against discrimination in any institution or business, on any basis, where Federal moneys support the operation of that entity.

The application of this policy is self-evident. Suppose a black child—whose family has the ability to pay for services—is barred because of race from the privately-funded children's wing of a hospital. And suppose that hospital receives substantial Federal funding in all other departments and, in fact, is a hospital whose construction and major capital expenditures were only made possible through the use of Federal dollars. Most would agree that this action would be cruel and inhumane. Yet, under the court's limited interpretation of the law, the Federal Government would simply turn its head and keep writing the checks.

There is no justification for dismantling the safeguards of civil rights laws. We should be proud of the strides we have made in eliminating discrimination, but we must remember that they were due, in part, to the level of vigilance and accountability our courts applied to civil rights enforcement. It is imperative to maintain those high standards we set for application of these laws.

In this time of economic deliberation, we must consider the effect our decisions will have on our future. That future lies squarely on our ability to motivate collective efforts to solve our Nation's problems. Discrimination restricts collective participation and robs our society of integrity and human potential. This is a debt we cannot afford and should not accept.

This Congress must make it clear to the courts and to those who choose to accept Federal dollars, that we will not accept civil rights violations in any degree. In America, equal opportunity is not negotiable. It is the law. I urge my colleagues to tackle the temptation of complacency and work to restore effective civil rights legislation.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I strongly support the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. This legislation is important, necessary, and timely. As was the case with last session's Omnibus Civil Rights Act, I am proud to serve once again as a principal cosponsor of this measure.

Without a doubt Mr. President, the Civil Rights Restoration Act represents the single most important civil rights legislation we will consider during the 99th Congress. By passing this bill, this distinguished body can reaffirm our Government's longstanding commitment to the principle of expanding opportunities—not only for minority Americans—but for women, the disabled, and our senior citizens as well.

Two overriding concerns dictate that we act swiftly in passing this bill. First, Mr. President, there is the decision of the Supreme Court in the infamous Grove City case. This holding effectively reversed over 20 years of judicial and legislative interpretation with respect to the nature and extent of the enforcement mechanisms available to the Federal Government in connection with its prohibitions against unlawful discrimination.

Second, we must consider the implications of the reelection of President Reagan. We must ask ourselves what Mr. Reagan's administration is likely to do in the wake of Grove City. This administration has, after all, seized upon every opportunity to retreat from well-established Federal commitments to civil rights and equality of opportunity. Furthermore, the Justice Department has clearly indicated its intention to interpret and apply the Grove City holding in the broadest context possible. Mr. President, such an interpretation threatens more than the title IX prohibition against gender-based discrimination which was before the Court in Grove City; it would also leave us powerless to prevent discrimination based upon age, race, or physical disability.

Rarely do issues of public policy provide us such clear-cut choices. Quite simply, passage of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 gives us a means to support the aspirations of all Americans for a more just society; a society in which all of us enjoy the full protection of the law and are allowed to make meaningful contributions, limited only by our imagination, talents, and abilities.

Most important of all Mr. President, passage of this legislation will reaffirm Congress' commitment to the principle that no public funds shall be used in any manner that results in subsidizing unlawful discrimination against other Americans—period.

Again, I am honored to serve as a cosponsor of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. I urge all of my colleagues to join with us in this important work.

Finally Mr. President, I am confident that in this session of Congress, we will successfully rearticulate this Nation's highest and best commitment to the cherished ideal of equal opportunity and equality of treatment under the law, without regard for age, race, sex, or physical disability.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, our Government cannot fight discrimination unless it has the tools to do so. For 20 years, our civil rights laws have helped us to combat discrimination based on race, religion, sex, handicap, and age. Last year, the Supreme Court's decision in the Grove City case eroded our ability to fight discrimination. This year, passage of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will allow us again to prohibit discrimination by any entity that receives Federal money.

We must not allow our Government to remain in the position of supporting schools and other institutions that discriminate. In recent years, we have made major inroads against racial segregation in our Nation's schools, hospitals, and other public institutions. We cannot let the barriers of the past rise again.

Instead, we must rededicate this Nation to the idea that discrimination based on sex, race, handicap, or age is absolutely unacceptable anywhere in the United States. We must use the resources of our Government to fight discrimination and we must have both the means and the resources to enforce our civil rights laws.

For these reasons, I am proud to give my support to the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. The rights of millions of Americans cannot be protected unless we give force to the original intent of our civil rights laws by passing this legislation. We cannot allow Federal money to support discrimination. We must reverse Grove City early in this session.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I proudly join several of my colleagues as an original cosponsor of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. The aim of this legislation is clear—to restore in full force and effect four major civil rights laws that prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, gender, disability, or age in institutions that receive Federal funds. This legislation was of the utmost importance during the 98th Congress and the passage of time has only increased the need for the speedy enactment of this bill's provisions. I am hopeful that both bodies will act responsibly by passing this legislation quickly.

America is a great land that provides boundless opportunities for her many citizens. To assure that all Americans have an equal chance to share in these opportunities, Congress has passed laws to prohibit discrimination because of one's skin color, gender, disability, or age. Whether all Americans will continue to be protected from these forms of discrimination has been thrown into doubt because of the now infamous Supreme Court decision in Grove City College versus Bell last February. As my colleagues are aware, that decision restricted the application of title IX's antisex discrimination provisions to the specific program, as opposed to the entire institution, that received Federal funds. That interpretation runs counter to congressional intent and the enforcement of title IX's provisions by all administrations, Democratic and Republican, except for the present one. Since the program or activity language interpreted by the Supreme Court appears in the laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race, disability and age in institutions receiving Federal funds, the Grove City decision has restricted the application of those laws' antidiscrimination provisions as well.

The bill introduced today amends title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975—the four major laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race, gender, disability, and age in institutions receiving Federal assistance—in the same manner. A definition of program or activity is inserted in these four laws to insure that an entire entity is covered by the nondiscrimination provisions whenever a department or unit of that entity receives Federal assistance. The bill also provides that only that unit of a State or local government, or that unit to which funds are extended, is covered. Furthermore, enforcement provisions of these laws will insure that fund termination is pinpointed to the particular unit in noncompliance. In making these changes, the bill seeks to restore coverage and enforcement of these laws in a manner that existed prior to the Grove City decision.

The issue before us today is very simple. It is a matter of justice and fairness. Regardless of whether Federal assistance is extended to educational institutions, corporations, or local governments, justice dictates that taxpayers' funds should not be used to subsidize or encourage discrimination. As a civilized society that demands equal justice and opportunity for all, we cannot permit restrictions on our commitment to prohibit unlawful discrimination. Our civil rights laws have worked well in the past 20 years. The accomplishments of our minority and women athletes in last year's Olympics are but one measure of the success that these laws have had in removing the obstacles to equal opportunity that previously existed. By passing this legislation, Congress can make clear that we will not permit these invidious forms of discrimination to reappear with the assistance of taxpayer dollars.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am proud to join my colleagues in cosponsoring the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985, a bill to clarify and restore the civil rights protections afforded under four key civil rights statutes. This action is necessary to nullify the severe restrictions placed on the scope of title IX of the Education Act of 1972 by the Supreme Court in last year's Grove City case and to insure that such restrictions are not imposed on civil rights laws prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of race, handicap, and age.

In the Grove City case, the Supreme Court held that title IX's prohibition against sex discrimination in educational programs or activities receiving Federal funds applied only to the specific program directly affected by Federal funds. In so doing, the Court opened the door to the possibility that other schools and institutions could receive Federal aid for some programs while discriminating in others. This dangerous precedent flies in the face of our historic commitment to eliminate discrimination in all Federal assistance programs.

This commitment was expressed most clearly by President Kennedy in his call for enactment of the Civil Rights Act:

> Simple justice requires that public funds, to which taxpayers of all races, contribute, not be spent in any fashion which encourages, entrenches, subsidizes or results in racial discrimination.

That basic principle was embodied in title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and has served as the model for subsequent civil rights legislation.

Congress enacted title IX of the Education Act of 1972 to outlaw discrimination on the basis of sex under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance. In 1973, Congress adopted section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act to include the handicapped under the antidiscrimination rubric, and in 1975, passed the Age Discrimination Act to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of age. The language prohibiting discrimination in each of these acts is the same. It has clearly been the intent of Congress that each of these acts be given the same broad interpretation that had been given title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In each and every case it has been our intent to expand the protections of the original Civil Rights Act. This can only be accomplished by continuing to give these laws the broadest of interpretations.

Mr. President, it should be evident to all that our civil rights laws cannot protect all persons equally if they are applied selectively. And it is not just women who stand to lose if the Supreme Court Grove City decision is allowed to stand. Unchallenged, it threatens the integrity of similar provisions in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975.

The bill we are introducing today clarifies the original intent of those laws to deny all Federal funds to any institution that discriminates on the basis of sex, race, national origin, handicap, or age. It restores the broad scope of those laws by carefully defining program or activity and by setting standards to determine their application.

Mr. President, we must deal swiftly and surely with this threat to civil rights protection. Women and minorities are looking to us to defend their hard-won opportunities and freedoms, and to ensure that antidiscrimination laws are not selectively enforced. This is not the time to sound the trumpet of retreat. This the time to continue the long march toward equal opportunity. Let us pass this legislation, and let us move boldly toward the day when our Nation holds this truth to be selfevident: that not just men, but all people are created equal.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues in introducing the Omnibus Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985.

Twenty-one years ago, President Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, protecting certain basic rights of minorities in America. Now, more than two decades later, we find once again that we must clarify the enforcement requirements of the 1964 statute, as well as those for statutes based on it to protect women, the disabled and the elderly from discrimination. In the process, we can reaffirm our commitment to reduce the pernicious scourge of discrimination in our society, and renew our commitment to the ideals of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

This is legislation with the same purposes President Johnson spoke of 21 years ago, when he signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964:

> Its purpose is not to punish. Its purpose is not to divide, but to end divisions—divisions which have all lasted too long. Its purpose is national, not regional.
> Its purpose is to promote a more abiding commitment to freedom, a more constant pursuit of justice, and a deeper respect for human dignity.

A year earlier, at the commencement address at Howard University, President Johnson described the alliance which would help produce the 1964 legislation:

> . . . it is a tribute to America that, once aroused, the courts and the Congress, the President and most of the people, have been the allies of progress.

Mr. President, it is with much regret that I must ask today if our allies have not diminished in number, or at least in agreement on the meaning of equal protection.

The Supreme Court's interpretation of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, on February, 28, 1984 in the case of Grove City College versus Bell, is the case in point. The Court adopted the position of President Reagan and his Attorney General Smith, that prohibitions against discrimination under title IX extend only to a specific program discriminating on the basis of sex, and not to the entire educational institution. Does this not demonstrate how fragile are our legal responses to social ills, though crafted with the best of intentions? The Court's ruling had immediate implications for women throughout all the Nation's educational institutions—those in athletic programs, those striving for tenure, those seeking protection from sexual harrassment.

The Court's ruling has more subtle, but no less important, implications for minority Americans protected by title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, for disabled Americans protected by section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and for senior citizens protected by the Age Discrimination Act. Under these statutes, the Federal Government, may withhold Federal funds, or apply injunctive relief, when any institution or recipient discriminates on the basis or race, national origin, disability, or age.

These statutes, cornerstones of all civil rights protections in this country, are in danger of being weakened in a similar manner as title IX. Under such an interpretation, if one program administered by a grant recipient practices discrimination, Federal funds could be withheld, for that program alone, but not for other programs, administered by the same recipient.

Mr. President, I was not a Member of the U.S. Senate when the Education Amendments of 1972, the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 were enacted. I was, however, a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States, and I submit to you that it was the intent of the framers of this legislation to compel the most complete compliance.

I would again ask my colleagues to recall President Johnson's message to the Howard University class of 1965:

> Freedom is the right to share, share fully and equally in American society, to vote, to hold a job, to enter a public place, to go to school. It is the right to be treated in every part of our national life as a person equal in dignity and promise to others. But freedom is not enough . . . it is not enough just to open the gates of opportunity. All our citizens must have the ability to walk through those gates and this is the next and more profound stage of the battle for civil rights.

This Congress can set the record straight. The Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 would affirm our commitment to vigorous protection of the civil rights of American women, minorities, elderly, and disabled citizens. It would make clear, in each case, that no institution or entity receiving Federal funds may practice discrimination.

Mr. President, but 4 months ago, during the final days of the 98th Congress, the predecessor to the legislation we introduce today was defeated. At that time, I noted that:

> We have learned to the extraordinary shock of the country, that we do not have a majority in the U.S. Senate to restate one simple provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, along with the Education Amendents of 1972, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975. A simple measure which does not add to the laws of the Nation so much as it provides that the basic Constitutional laws will be enforced.

I do hope that the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 will not provoke the shameful delays and procedural maneuvering we witnessed at the close of the 98th Congress. I call on my colleagues to give this matter thorough, complete and fair consideration. We can restore our Government's commitment, and in this way protect the ideals of the Civil Rights Act of 1964: "This Civil Rights Act is a challenge to all of us to go to work in our communities and our States, in our homes and in our hearts, to eliminate the last vestiges of injustice in our beloved country." It was not too late to do so in 1984. It is still not too late in 1985.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, once again I stand with many of my colleagues in both Houses as a sponsor of a vital piece of legislation—the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985. What I said here last April, when we introduced the Civil Rights Act of 1984, is true today, and I will repeat it just as often as necessary, until the Congress acts: Our task is simple justice.

In February 1984, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the prohibition against sex discrimination in colleges receiving Federal financial assistance. The case was Grove City versus Bell, and its echo was heard in Vermont, and throughout the Nation.

While Grove City only dealt with title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, similar statutory language promised similarly restrictive interpretations of Federal protections against discrimination based on race, age, and handicap status.

These are statutes that have set the moral tone for our growth and maturity as a people. These are statutes that have both guaranteed private rights and have made the public statement that tax dollars will never again support discrimination in the United States.

Last April I argued that every generation must be the zealous guardian of the gifts of the past. Among the most important gifts are the laws that give meaning to our rights, and remedies for their violation.

The Civil Rights Act of 1984 did not become the law, but our zeal to act can be no less today, our respect for the lessons of the past can be no smaller, and our pact with future generations of Americans can be no less powerful.

The four civil rights laws that are affected by Grove City each provided institution-wide coverage against discrimination. This meant that when a college received Federal financial assistance, it was barred from discriminating in any of its programs or activities—throughout the institution—even ones that did not receive any Federal support.

A college that was covered was simply a college that could not discriminate on the basis of sex.

But not every program or activity in a covered college faced the termination of Federal funds under the pre-Grover City law if the college was guilty of sex discrimination. The law was drafted carefully to cut off funds only to those programs or activities that actually discriminated.

The coverage section of the law, therefore, was broader in its scope than the provision of the law dealing with remedies available to the Federal Government where discrimination was found. The broader coverage language allowed investigations to begin whenever a college receiving Federal financial assistance was accused of discriminating. The investigators were not required to limit their initial investigation to programs or activities receiving Federal aid. Also, an individual who was victimized by sex discrimination could seek to enjoin a college receiving Federal financial assistance from continuing that discrimination, even though it might be taking place in a program or activity that did not receive Federal money.

In 1972 some Members of Congress felt that the remedies section of the law—the section providing for fund termination—should be as broad as the coverage section.

Others argued that where the Government's clout is involved, the strong threat of fund termination should be limited to programs that discriminate, and should not apply to the entire educational institution.

The solution of providing broad coverage and narrow fund termination was a compromise that most Americans over the years have regarded as fair and effective.

I think that is an important point to mention, because laws that mandate fairness must themselves be fair.

But the Grove City case ended that compromise and thereby injured that sense of fairness. The Supreme Court found that grants of Federal assistance to students were in effect grants to the college. So far, so good. But because the underlying law barred discrimination under any education program or activity, the Court limited the coverage of the law to whichever program or activity it could say received the Federal money. In what I think was a break with both logic and past history, the Court found that Federal aid to the students represented aid only to the college's financial aid program, and not to the college itself.

Recall that we are talking about the basic coverage of title IX, not the section dealing with the more limited Federal remedies. So what the Court was saying in Grove City College is that only those programs within a college that actually receive Federal dollars are barred from sex discrimination, that is, are covered.

This decision deeply affects the architecture of the bill that Congress fashioned in 1972 and significantly diminishes the quality of the protection it offered.

When an educational institution receives money from the taxpayers of the United States, it is very easy to say why it may not discriminate anywhere within its operations: simple justice.

The very same principle applies to racial discrimination under title VI, which stopped Federal subsidies to segregated programs or activities.

The very same principle applies to discrimination against the disabled under section 504, which ended a long era in our history when a person's so-called disabilities were more important than the person's potential.

The same principle applies to discrimination against older Americans under the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 which announced that Federal dollars will not be used to support health, education, rehabilitation, and other services that judged a person's age and which declared that the only things too old to serve this country are its sterotypes.

The debate last year over S. 2568 was long and rancorous. Opponents of the legislation claimed that the bill went beyond its restorative purpose—which most of them claimed to embrace—and extended the reach of the four statutes in question.

I am confident that the witnesses in opposition to S. 2568 sincerely believed that its true result, if not its purpose, was to expand coverage beyond its parameters in the pre-Grove City days.

But the argument was never true. You could glean the errors from how farfetched the opponents' arguments were, as well as their supporting hypothetical examples.

The strategy of many opponents became clear: To argue that because the bill was very detailed, it raised many new questions. Toward the end of the Congress, when shorter, compromise versions of the legislation were offered, they became too vague.

The fact was that few bills dealing with difficult and complex social problems have ever been as carefully and thoughtfully drafted. Again this year, a tremendous effort has gone into our new bill, and I was glad I could be a part of that effort.

While the goal of the bill is the same as the goal of last year's bill, to end tax-subsidized discrimination, the approach is different. Instead of defining recipient in all four statutes, the bill defines the very words misconstrued in Grove City, program or activity. I am unable to come up with a single hypothetical case in which this year's bill would produce a different result from last year's or would expand coverage beyond what the long-accepted administrative interpretations in pre-Grove City days.

But if the year's bill is clearer—and it is—and if its restorative purpose is more easily demonstrated—and it is—I applaud the changes.

The need is great and the time is overdue.

Let us proceed with all the speed possible. Let us deliberate. Let us debate. Let us set down our legislative purpose so clearly that future generations will have no doubts about our goals.

But let us pass this bill and pass it soon.

Simple justice will be the result.

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. COHEN):

S. 432. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide taxpayers a cause of action for wrongful levy on property and a stay of a levy during the period of an installment loan plan; to the Committee on Finance.

CIVL ACTION BY TAXPAYERS AMENDMENT

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer today an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code which would help protect the taxpayer from certain irregular and arbitrary practices of the Internal Revenue Service.

The Civil Actions by Taxpayers for the Violation of Certain Procedures bill would allow a taxpayer to bring a civil action against the United States in a U.S. District Court when the IRS has imposed or maintained a lien or levy on the taxpayer's property for a tax delinquency in a manner which violates the levy and lien provisions of the Tax Code or IRS regulations, or is knowingly in violation of any written agreement entered into between the Service and the taxpayer.

On July 13, 1980, I chaired a hearing held by the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, of which I am currently the ranking minority member to investigate the collection practices of the IRS and their effect on small businesses. The investigation was initiated in response to complaints from small business owners and IRS officers, regarding the IRS' arbitrary and capricious use of lien, levy, and seizure authority to collect delinquent taxes. During the hearing the subcommittee found, among other things, that the IRS was abusing their enforcement authority and the taxpayer had no meaningful recourse. At the time of the hearing, the evidence also indicated that the IRS had a penchant for seizure and enforcement statistics and sometimes pressured its revenue officers to seize taxpayer property, in contradiction of their own training and good sense, with little or no attention to considerations of the amount of money collected, the extenuating circumstances of the taxpayer, or stated IRS policy.

The forcible collection powers of lien, levy, and seizure conferred upon the IRS are extremely powerful. They play an important role in the IRS, collection ability and are necessary to ensure that taxpayers will not ignore the Federal tax system. However, these powers must not be abused or applied arbitrarily. The taxpayer should be able to rely on the IRS to follow its own policies and regulations, and not engage in collection practices that are inconsistent with these policies, regulations, or the Internal Revenue Code.

Currently, when the IRS violates its own collection policies and the regulations of the Internal Revenue Code, the aggrieved taxpayer cannot seek redress in the Federal courts, but must instead rely on the internal administrative procedures of the IRS. This is not enough. The taxpayer should be able to bring his or her claim into an unbiased judicial forum empowered to enforce its findings on the parties. The tax collection activity of the IRS often affects the financial survival and livelihood of individuals, therefore taxpayers should be able to go into Federal court and be entitled to their full remedial power and protections.

The bill that I am offering today will in no way reduce the Service's ability to properly pursue its tax collection program, but will protect taxpayers from the unlawful administration of programs and procedures and irregular collection methods.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 432

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. GORE, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 434. A bill to extend the authorization of the Robert A. Taft Institute Assistance Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ROBERT A. TAFT INSTITUTE ASSISTANCE ACT AUTHORIZATION

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to reauthorize one of this Nation's most outstanding programs, the Robert A. Taft Institute for Two Party Government. This institute, founded in 1961 as a memorial to the late Senator Robert A. Taft, is dedicated to a notion we all share. It is dedicated to the principle that each citizen should have an opportunity to contribute to government and politics.

The Robert A. Taft Institute of Two Party Government is a nonpartisan, nonprofit, tax-exempt corporation operating under a charter granted by the board of regents of the State of New York. Its mission is to enable teachers, administrators, and others to explore the American system of government and politics. Furthermore, it works to enhance their knowledge and teaching skills and, in turn, to stimulate and encourage their students to take an interest in, and participate in, governmental, political, and related community-based activities.

Its tasks are expounded by focusing on the compelling need for responsible citizen participation in politics. The Taft Institute approaches its tasks believing that principles of American self-government are best served by a well-informed public. One of the best ways of accomplishing this goal is through teaching. Taft has excelled in its attempt to teach these principles to our citizenry. They continue to have seminars and workshops throughout the country for the benefit of us all. I would like to list just a few of their recent seminars: A Taft Seminar for Teachers was held at the University of Oregon, Eugene during June 17-29, 1984; a Taft Seminar for Teachers was held at the Curry Memorial School of Education, the University of West Virginia, July 16-27, 1984; and a Taft Seminar was held at Eastern Kentucky University during June 11-28, 1984. There were other seminars and workshops held throughout the country that are equally worthy of mention, but I will only highlight the forementioned.

The director of the Taft Seminar for Teachers 1984 at the University of Oregon gave an excellent report of their seminar. He noted that politics was in the air as participants met from June 17 to 30, only weeks before Democrats and Republicans held national conventions in San Francisco and Dallas. They made a conscious effort to design their curriculum with the election year in view, culminating in a windup banquet debate on party prospects between an incumbent Republican Oregon attorney general and a Democrat candidate for the U.S. Senate. As stated by the director, the goal of each seminar has been refreshing and (re)educating the participants' understanding of the political world, and more particularly, their appreciation of the two-party system. The director of the Taft Seminar for Teachers at the Curry Memorial School of Education, the University of Virginia noted that he is amazed how well each cohort of teachers melds together to make the seminar a success. The director further notes that each year the seminar reflects a different group personality, but invariably they quickly solidify into a group that stimulates speakers with analytical and challenging questions and provokes each other to rethink political values. The Taft Institute director of the June 11-28, 1984, Eastern Kentucky Seminar states that the Taft program is more than a good program. It is the dedication and enthusiatic participation of teachers who add to the sacrifices they make each day of the school year to give up part of their summers to increase their understanding and appreciation of the political process and the American two-party system. These seminars have been held throughout the country and I could easily list commendable statements from directors and participants of each seminar.

Taft seminars are sponsored by universities and colleges across the country; they provide rigorous courses in practical politics and political science. Seminars vary from 2 to 4 weeks in length, and usually take place during the summer. They also award graduate level credit. Each Taft Seminar is organized according to comprehensive guidelines and is directed by a professor of political science who is a faculty member of the sponsoring institution. The Taft Institute is involved in the planning and organization of each program. The seminars include experienced politicians and political scientists who come together with high school and elementary school teachers to explore American freedom, the two-party political process, the role of political parties, and the role of each citizen in self-government.

The Taft Institute of Two Party Government has sponsored more than 500 seminars. These seminars have included more than 100 colleges and universities with 15,000 teachers from all 50 States. In any one year 2 million students benefit from this program. Mr. President, the success of the Taft Institute cannot be denied.

Our children, families, and all communities need continued exposure to the American political system. The Taft Institute provides this opportunity. This legislation promotes a strong America, and it enhances our mission. Mr. President, American democracy takes all citizens putting forth some effort to make it work. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in recognizing the importance of the Robert A. Taft Institute Assistance Act. It benefits all Americans and enhances the growth and development of our political system. It shows our continuing commitment to a strong, involved, and well-informed citizenry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 434

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 435. A bill to amend the consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to improve and streamline the provision of farm credit assistance through the consolidation of the real estate, operating, economic emergency, soil and water, limited resource, recreation, and rural youth loan programs into one Agricultural Adjustment Loan, to reduce paperwork and make the Farmers Home Administration loan process more responsive to farmers' needs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

CONSOLIDATED AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT LOAN ACT

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today which is similar to S. 2057, which I introduced in the 98th Congress. It deals with the consolidation of loan programs in the Farmers Home Administration.

I might preface my remarks by saying that last year when I introduced this bill, I sent a copy of it to every State Farmers Home director in the United States; and before the national Farmers Home Administration office could send word to the State directors telling them not to endorse the bill, we received several responses from directors saying that they thought it was the greatest thing since night baseball, because what it does is to consolidate into one loan program the seven loan programs that the Farmers Home Administration has the authority to make. It consolidates all seven programs under one.

It would be a monumental cut in redtape and paperwork for both the farmer and the Farmers Home Administration. I hope the Farmers Home Administration this year will not take such an intransigent attitude as they did last Congress, because I am convinced that there are substantial savings and improvements in this bill. There is not a business in the country, particularly a banker or a financial lending officer, who would not jump at the chance to consolidate seven lending programs under one.

Mr. President, this would give a farmer the opportunity to put both his land and his equipment and his property, and his operating loan all into one loan, at one rate of interest and one payment.

The farmers would welcome this simplicity, this reform, and they certainly would welcome eliminating a lot of redtape that they are subjected to now.

This bill also would limit a farmer, either for insured or guaranteed loans, to $500,000. The whole rationale of this bill, of course, is simplicity and convenience.

Right now, one of the biggest cries from my State is that we do not have enough Farmers Home personnel to even begin to process all the applications for loans that they have. So, perhaps even with the amount of personnel Farmers Home has right now, they could do a much better job if we consolidated all the loan programs and they did not have to know so many different rules and regulations.

There are some changes in this bill which are different from S. 2057, which was introduced last year. The most significant one and the one I think farmers will welcome most, is that the bill requires the Farmers Home Administration, if it forecloses on a farmer's land, No. 1, to give him an opportunity to extract his home from the foreclosure. FmHA would be given the authority to make a separate loan to a farmer in default to cover his principal residence.

Farmers are strapped in this country. But I do not think farmers should forfeit their homes to Farmers Home if there is any way at all that the Farmers Home Administration can arrange to secure themselves with the collateral they are foreclosing on without taking the farmer's home too. If they could reschedule the loan covering the home only, at the equity the farmer owns in it, they should do so. This requires them in good faith to consider and implement such a plan if at all possible under the circumstances.

Second, the bill requires Farmers Home to take the land they have foreclosed on and keep it for 5 years in inventory. The farmer, under this bill, is granted 5 years to redeem the land.

Farmers Home could take the land on which they have foreclosed, put it in inventory, and maybe do nothing with it except give it a chance to rest, and use it for good soil conservation practices.

At the end of 5 years or any time during the 5-year period the farmer against whom the foreclosure was levied will have the right to redeem his farm. The second salutary purpose of this, incidentally, in addition to the soil conservation practices that they could put into effect on the farm, is that Farmers Home could choose to take that land out of production, and everyone knows one of the biggest problems we have with the farm programs in this country is overproduction. Incidentally, it is an interesting thing that 2 percent of the farms in this country have gone on the market because the farmers cannot make it, and just putting 2 percent of the farmland in this country on the market has depressed the price of farmland by 10 percent. And at least if the Farmers Home Administration is going to foreclose on the land, it will take the land off the market if this bill is passed and keep it in inventory for 5 years, and at least give that farmer some hope of redeeming his land.

Third, this bill provides that the Farmers Home Administration will not take any more collateral than is absolutely necessary to secure their loan. Right now the Farmers Home Administration takes as collateral everything they can—they take the home, the land, the equipment, they take the crop, they take the wife, they take the children, they take a mortgage on everything they can lay their hands on whether it is necessary or not. And this bill would require them to limit their collateral to just what they really need to secure their loan, and no more.

Mr. President, our farmers need help, the kind of help that this bill will provide. Certainly, it will be no panacea, but if the processes of the farmers' primary lending agency, Farmers Home Administration, are streamlined and redtape is cut dramatically, if farmers can keep their homes and redeem their lands, and provide only that collateral necessary to secure loans, then certainly a lot of pain, heartache, and financial burden will be lifted from them.

Mr. President, in the last few days several Senators—Senators BOREN, EXON, BENTSEN, MELCHER, and others—have in floor statements graphically outlined the crisis our farmers are facing. As Senator BENTSEN pointed out, the term "farm crisis" has been used so often that it has lost its shock value. Those of us from farm States are almost at a loss as to how to really get the attention of the general public and the attention of the administration on this very serious issue. Over the last few days, Senators have put statistics in the record that graphically illustrate the enormity of the problem. At the risk of repetition, here is the extent of the problem. Equity in American agricultural land has declined by more than $105 billion in the last 4 years. Bankruptcies and forced liquidations have increased 200 percent over the past 5 years. Over the past 3 years, land values have declined by 22 percent in real terms, and in some parts of the country, they have fallen by fully 50 percent in value.

Thirty-five years ago, in 1959, total farm debt was $12.5 billion and total net farm income was $19 billion. By last year, 1984, farm income in constant dollars had fallen to $5.4 billion and farm debt had increased to the staggering sum of $215 billion. Mr. President, the situation is very sad, and we will see thousands of farmers go out of business this year and never return.

As I said, our farmers need all the help we can provide. I do not offer this legislation as a complete solution to our agriculture credit problems. I do think, however, that streamlining our processess, protecting farmers' homes, providing them the right to redeem their lands, and limiting the collateral taken on FmHA loans only to that absolutely necessary to secure the debt, are very important steps that this Congress ought to take to help our farmers.

Mr. President, this is a long, comprehensive bill, and I hope Senators will have their staffs analyze it very carefully and critique it for them. I hope the Agriculture Committee will allow hearings to be held on this bill at the earliest possible time. And certainly I will offer it at the right time, if the Agriculture Committee does not report it out, as an amendment on some agricultural bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill and the section-by-section analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2) through (4), the schedule of repayments on a loan made or insured under this subtitle shall be established by the Secretary in a manner consistent with the purpose of and need for the loan, the useful life of the security pledged for the loan, and the reasonable repayment ability of the borrower as determined in accordance with the plan of operation of the borrower approved under section 305.

"(2) Such loan repayment schedule shall require such borrower to make at least one annual installment payment on such loan during the period of the loan unless the Secretary defers repayment of the loan under section 309.

"(3) The period for the repayment of a real estate loan may not exceed forty years.

"(4)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the period for the repayment of a production loan may not exceed seven years.

"(B) The period for the repayment of a production loan used for the annual production of crops may not exceed one year.

"SEC. 309. (a) To be eligible for the consolidation, rescheduling, reamortization, or deferral of a loan made or insured under this subtitle, the borrower of the loan must file with the Secretary a revised plan of operation for using such loan or insured loan which justifies such action and demonstrates that such action will enable the borrower to carry out the terms and conditions of the loan.

"(b) The Secretary shall consolidate, reschedule, reamortize, or defer a loan made or insured under this subtitle if—

"(1) the Secretary—

"(A) approves the revised plan of operation referred to in subsection (a); and

"(B) determines that such action will assist in the orderly collection of the loan;

"(2) the borrower of the loan—

"(A) is unable to make payments on the loan in accordance with the original payment schedule established for the loan—

"(i) due to circumstances beyond the control of the borrower; or

"(ii) due to circumstances within the control of the borrower which the borrower agrees to correct in accordance with the revised plan of operation;

"(B) meets the eligibility criteria established for the loan under section 305, except that the Secretary may not require, as a condition of eligibility for such action, that the borrower be able to repay a loan other than a loan subject to such action; and

"(C) is cooperating with the Secretary in servicing the loan;

"(3) such action—

"(A) will enable the borrower to continue farming operations; and

"(B) is not taken solely to remove a delinquency in making payments on the loan or to delay liquidation of the loan; and

"(4) in the case of the consolidation of such loans, the Secretary consolidates—

"(A) real estate loans only if such loans have a period of repayment of less than forty years; and

"(B) production loans only if—

"(i) the loans to be consolidated were made to a borrower under section 306(b) for the same purpose; and

"(ii) the Secretary assures that only one note must be serviced for each such loan.

"(c)(1) The interest rate on a loan consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized under this section shall be the lower of—

"(A) the rate required under section 308(a) to be paid on a loan made or insured under this subtitle on the date the loan was consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized; or

"(B) the rate prescribed in the original note made for the loan.

"(2) If the borrower of a loan consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized under this section qualified as a limited resource applicant at the time such action was taken and subsequently does not qualify as a limited resource applicant, the Secretary shall reschedule the loan in accordance with this section.

"(d)(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2) through (4), the schedule of repayments on a loan consolidated, rescheduled, reamortized, or deferred under this section shall be established by the Secretary in a manner consistent with the purpose of and need for the loan, the useful life of the security pledged for the loan, and the reasonable repayment ability of the borrower as determined in accordance with the revised plan of operation referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The period for the repayment of a real estate loan reamortized under this section may not exceed forty years from the date of such action.

"(3) The period for the repayment of a production loan consolidated or reamortized under this section may not exceed seven years from the date of such action.

"(4) If the Secretary elects to defer the payment of installments on principal or interest, or both, due on a loan made or insured under this subtitle, or consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized under this section, the Secretary shall—

"(A) defer no more than three such installments;

"(B) require the borrower in each installment payment made on the loan to repay—

"(i) at least part of the interest payment due in such installment; and

"(ii) at the earliest possible date permitted under the revised plan of operation of the borrower, all of such payment due in such installment;

"(C) defer such payments for no longer than the period ending on the final due date on the loan;

"(D) encourage the borrower to make such payments as soon as the borrower is able to make such payments notwithstanding the fact the repayment period for the loan has not expired; and

"(E) give preference in deferring such loans to beginning farmers, limited resource applicants, and borrowers who have suffered production and economic losses due to natural or economic conditions.

"(e) If the Secretary modifies the terms of a loan under this section and determines that a new mortgage on property used to secure the loan is necessary to protect the loan priority of the Secretary, the Secretary may require that a new mortgage on such property be executed.

"(f)(1) If the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Agriculture or a United States Attorney is taking servicing actions with respect to a loan made or insured under this subtitle or are planning to take such actions in the near future, the Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration may not take servicing actions under this subtitle with respect to such loan.

"(2) The Secretary may not take servicing actions with respect to a loan made or insured under this subtitle in order to circumvent any agreement to permit a graduated loan repayment schedule.

"SEC. 310. (a) If a loan made under this subtitle is secured by the principal residence of the borrower of the loan and the borrower defaults on the repayment of the loan and, as a result of such default, the borrower is required to forfeit the residence to the Secretary or to pay to the Secretary an amount equal to the equity of the borrower in the residence, the appropriate Director of the State office of the Farmers Home Administration may make a loan to the borrower in accordance with this section.

"(b) In order to be eligible to obtain a loan under this section, a borrower must have the ability (as determined by the Secretary) to repay the loan and otherwise meet the eligibility requirements established under section 305.

"(c) The amount of a loan made under this section may not exceed the lesser of—

"(1) an amount equal to the amount of equity the borrower has in such residence at the time such loan is made; or

"(2) the outstanding amount of principal and interest owed by the borrower to the Secretary on the loan referred to in subsection (a) on which the borrower has defaulted.

"(d) The interest rate on a loan made under this section shall be the rate required under section 308(a) to be paid on a loan made or insured under this subtitle on the date the loan is made.

"(e) The period for the repayment of a loan made under this section may not exceed twenty-five years.

"(f) If a borrower makes all payments due on a loan made under this section in accordance with the loan agreement entered into with respect to such loan, an action may not be brought against the borrower for the repayment of such loan or the loan referred to in subsection (a) on which the borrower has defaulted.

"SEC. 311. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), to be eligible to obtain a loan under this subtitle, a borrower of the loan shall—

"(1) provide only such security for the loan as the Secretary determines is necessary to secure the loan, including real estate, buildings, machinery, equipment, crops, crop insurance, crop assignments, livestock product assignments, livestock, furniture, fixtures, inventory, accounts receivable, cash, stocks, bonds, personal and corporate guarantees, marketable securities, the cash surrender value of life insurance, or any combination thereof;

"(2) dispose of all real property which the Secretary determines is not essential to the operation of farm and nonfarm enterprises by the borrower;

"(3) in the case of a loan used for the annual production of crops or livestock, pledge such crops or livestock and any other property which the Secretary determines is necessary to secure the loan;

"(4) in the case of a real estate loan, pledge real estate to secure such loan; and

"(5) in the case of a loan secured by chattels whose loss would jeopardize the interests of the Federal Government, insure such chattels against hazards customarily covered by insurance in the surrounding community.

"(b) If a borrower provides security for a loan in accordance with subsection (a), the Secretary may not require as a condition of eligibility for the consolidation, rescheduling, reamortization, or deferral of the loan under section 309 that the borrower provide additional security for the loan.

"(c) If a borrower conveys real property to the Secretary in connection with a loan made under this subtitle, the Secretary shall permit the borrower to redeem the rights of the borrower in the property at any time during the five year period beginning on the date of such conveyance.".

BRIEF SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—"CONSOLIDATED AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT LOAN ACT OF 1985"

Section 302. Includes the definitions to be used in the act establishing the Agricultural Adjustment Loan program. The section maintains definitions found in current law.

Section 303. Establishes application requirements for applicants, maintaining the credit elsewhere test. To maintain continuity and avoid confusion, the changes that the bill makes in application requirements are only those necessary to carry out the overall purpose of the Act, which is to consolidate seven loan programs into one.

Section 304. Establishes a veterans preference in approving applications.

Section 305. Establishes eligibility requirements for applicants, maintaining most requirements found in current law. Eligibility requirements for corporations are left to the discretion of the Secretary. The same eligibility process and the same set of regulations will apply, regardless of the purpose for which a producer seeks a loan (except rural youth loans), thus greatly streamlining the loan operation.

Section 306. This section sets out the purposes of the consolidated loan. The purposes for the new Agricultural Adjustment loan include the purposes found currently in the operating, farm ownership, soil and water, economic emergency, limited resource, recreation, and rural youth loan programs. (The emergency loan [EM] program is not included.) The accumulated loan purposes expand loan flexibility within a single loan program. Rigid divisions between loan programs will be eliminated, which in turn will accelerate the loan process, reduce paperwork, minimize borrower confusion, and improve FmHA efficiency.

Section 307. Establishes a total loan limit of $500,000 for Agricultural Adjustment loans, for both insured and guaranteed loans. No division is required among the several loan purposes. Under the bill, rural youth loans may not exceed $10,000. A single loan limit will emphasize a consolidation of these aforementioned farm loan programs. Currently, insured operating loans have a $100,000 limit, guaranteed at $200,000. Insured farm ownership loans have a limit of $200,000, guaranteed at $300,000.

Section 308. Allows Secretary discretion in setting loan interest rates. Limited resource interest rates would be the greater of 5 percent or a rate 5 percent below the regular established rate set by the Secretary. Authority for limited resource graduation is included. Loan repayment requirements are similar to those in current law.

Section 309. Establishes conditions for loan consolidation, rescheduling, reamortization and deferral. Once the plan is approved, the Secretary will be required to accept loan servicing if financial stress is due to circumstances beyond the borrower's control. The Secretary would be prohibited from requiring repayment ability as a condition for loan servicing for any loan other than the loan or loans being serviced. Loans which are rescheduled, reamortized, or consolidated will retain the interest rate in the original note or the current rate, whichever is lower.

Section 310. Establishes the security requirements for an Agricultural Adjustment loan. The Secretary would be prohibited from requiring additional security as a condition for loan consolidation, rescheduling, reamortization, or deferral. In making loans, the Secretary could take as collateral only that necessary to secure the loan. Any real property forfeited could be redeemed by the borrower within 5 years.

Upon default, the Secretary would be authorized to make a separate loan to the borrower to cover the borrower's principal residence, thereby allowing the borrower to retain possession of his home.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. THURMOND):

S. 436. A bill to amend section 1979 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1983), relating to civil actions for deprivation of rights, to limit the applicability of that statute to laws relating to equal rights, and to provide a special defense to the liability of political subdivisions of States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MUNICIPAL LIABILITY

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, during the post-Civil War Reconstruction era, the 42d Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1871 to protect persons from the Deprivation under the color of State law, "of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States." The Revised Statutes of the United States enacted in 1874, contained a remedial provision, now 42 U.S.C. 1983, for securing these rights. I am in strong agreement with the intent of these laws—to guarantee to every American the rights secured by the Constitution and laws providing for equal rights. Indeed, I feel one of our most sacred obligations is to insure the constitutional rights of all our citizens.

However, over the past 23 years, due to a pair of recent Supreme Court rulings that have caused literal havoc in the interpretation of section 1983, a virtual explosion has occurred in the number of suits brought under that section.

In 1961, according to the administrative office of the U.S. courts, 270 civil rights cases were brought in Federal courts; this figure and those following exclude cases in which the United States was a party. Unfortunately, statistics are not available on specifically the number of section 1983 cases brought in Federal courts, but, in practice, the vast majority of these cases are suits against State and local governments, virtually all of which allege a section 1983 claim. By 1976 the number of these suits had leaped to 10,585; in addition, 6,958 State prisoners suits were brought—all of which would be section 1983 suits; habeas corpus suits are not included in this figure. During 1984 the number of civil rights suits brought in Federal court had increased to 19,299, plus 18,034 State prisoners suits. Therefore, between 1976 and 1984 the number of civil rights suits brought in Federal court—still excluding suits in which the United States was party—per year increased from 17,543 to 37,333, a 113-percent increase.

Thus, a very conservative estimate would indicate that 30,000 suits were brought alleging section 1983 claims against State and local governments or officials in 1984 alone. Some would estimate the number to be closer to 33,000. An extremely large amount of taxpayer money must be spent to merely defend States and municipalities in these suits.

This explosion of civil rights lawsuits was almost entirely the result of two Supreme Court cases, which in reality had little or nothing to do with anyone's constitutional rights. The following is an explanation of the cases as well as their undesired effects.

In the case of Maine v. Thibqutot, 448 U.S. 1 (1980), the Court expressly ruled, for the first time ever, that the phrase "and laws" was intended by Congress to provide a section 1983 remedy for deprivations of rights secured by any law of the United States. Civil actions may now be brought against State and local officials under 42 U.S.C. 1983 based on violations of laws which have no relevance whatsoever to deprivations of constitutional or statutory equal rights.

In Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), the court held that local governmental entities may not assert the good faith of their agent as a defense to liability under section 1983 suits. In other words, a local government may be liable in damages for violating a constitutional right that was unknown when the event occurred.

The burdens imposed by these holdings will be onerous. At the very least, our crowded courts will become even more crowded; our tax dollars will increasingly be spent in damages suits instead of providing needed services. Further, our State and local governments will be paranoid to the point of paralysis lest their action or inaction be later interpreted as unconstitutional and thus subject to costly damage suits.

The court has been careful to point out in many of its section 1983 cases, including Owen and Thiboutot, that Congress could, if it chose to do so, modify the statute or limit its application to certain types of statutes. Although the Supreme Court has been far from unimaginative in its section 1983 decisions over the last 20 years, its most recent interpretation of congressional silence compels us to let our voice be heard on this matter.

Mr. President, because the Court's recent rulings, in the cases of Maine v. Thiboutot and Owen v. City of Independence, involve areas of the law which are better left to Congress than to judicial activism, I wish to introduce some relatively simple, yet important amendments to 42 U.S.C. 1983. I want to emphasize that my amendments will not compromise the intent of section 1983—to provide persons with a remedy for violations of rights secured by the Constitution and laws providing for equal rights.

MAINE VERSUS THIBOUTOT

The Thiboutots were recipients of AFDC benefits administered by the Maine Department of Human Services. The amount paid to the family was calculated on the number of dependents of Mr. Thiboutots—three children from a previous marriage—rather than on the number of dependents he and his present wife claimed. Their petition for a reassessment of the benefits was based on amounts due them as parents of eight children. The Superior Court of Maine, in an order affirmed by the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, required the agency to make the requested changes and adopt new policies for similar cases.

The Court observed that the debate over the "scanty legislative history" of section 1983 did not result in a definitive answer on the intended scope of section 1983. Justice Brennan, writing for the majority of the Court, interpreted the "plain language" of section 1983 as providing a broad base for claims arising not only out of violations of constitutional rights, but also out of statutory rights unrelated to equal rights. Such claims are not limited to constitutional rights or equal rights created by statute, reasons Justice Brennan, because the section merely states "and laws" and "Congress attached no modifiers" to explain what type of laws were intended to be covered by the section.

The result is that a cause of action under section 1983 may now rest on the violation or deprivation of any rights secured by any statute. In other words, a disgruntled citizen, feeling that an official deprived him or her of some benefit under a program provided for by Federal law, may sue that official for damages under section 1983. Prior to this decision, section 1983 cases only involved rights secured by the Constitution and statutes which provided for equal rights. Now, the Court has transformed this remedy into a catchall cause of action for the redress of any infringement of statutory rights.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Powell, joined by the Chief Justice and Justice Rehnquist, stated that the "legislative history alone refutes the Court's interpretation of section 1983," and, further, that "until today this court never had held that section 1983 encompasses all purely statutory claims."

CONSEQUENCES OF THIBOUTOT

Even if we assume that the court's interpretation of legislative history and legal precedent are correct, an assumption that is questionable at best, the devastating effect of the decision in Thiboutot on our State and local governments would necessitate our action.

Commenting on the ruling in Thiboutot, the Wall Street Journal said that the decision:

> Couldn't do more harm if it were deliberately designed to subvert the federal system and bankrupt cities from coast to coast.

I do not think this statement is too far off the mark.

Justice Powell illustrates the new areas likely to be affected by the court's extension of liability. I include the appendix to his opinion at this point, because of the importance of understanding the extent to which this holding will intrude into the performance of State and local government activities.

Note the wide range of programs included in the list:

A small sample of statutes that arguably could give rise to § 1983 actions after today may illustrate the nature of the "civil rights" created by the Court's decision. The relevant enactments typically fall into one of three categories: (A) regulatory programs in which States are encouraged to participate, either by establishing their own plans of regulation that meet conditions set out in federal statutes, or by entering into cooperative agreements with federal officials; (B) resource management programs that may be administered by cooperative agreements between federal and state agencies; and (C) grant programs in which federal agencies either subsidize state or local welfare plans that meet federal standards.

Now, "virtually every * * * program, together with the State officials who administer [them] becomes subject to Federal judicial oversight at the behest of a single citizen, even if such a dramatic expansion of Federal court jurisdiction never would have been countenanced when these programs were adopted." See Chapman v. Huston Welfare Rights Org., 441 U.S. 600, 645 (1978), (concurring opinion, Justice Powell).

Ironically, with the expenses of increased litigation and court-ordered spending that will accompany this decision, local governments will be less able to implement Federal programs than they were before the ruling in Thiboutot.

This is not to say that a person should be left without a remedy when a State official harms him in violation of a Federal statute. In 1980, Congress abolished the amount-in-controversy requirement for Federal question jurisdiction. This means that any person has access to Federal courts on the basis of a violation of a Federal statute. If the Federal statute does not specifically grant such access, it can be implied from congressional intent under the doctrines of Cort v. Ash, another Supreme Court safeguard to guarantee violations of Federal rights have a remedy. Because injured persons can get into Federal court without resort to 42 U.S.C. 1983 for violations of Federal law, the primary significance of the Thiboutot decision becomes monetary. By alleging a civil rights violation under Thiboutot, lawyers may become eligible for court-awarded attorney fees, even though Congress has decided not to provide a fee-shifting provision for the violated Federal statute. Thiboutot has become a way for lawyers to get easy compensation, instead of a way to vindicate Federal rights. Those rights can be adjudicated in Federal court without Thiboutot. It only makes sense for Congress to limit this "back door" means of shifting legal fees to violations of traditional civil rights.

Justice Powell summed up the effect of the Thiboutot decision:

> No one can predict the extent to which litigation from today's decision will harass State and local officials; nor can one foresee the number of new filings in our already overburdened courts. But no one can doubt that these consequences will be substantial.

As we all know, our local governments face the problem of providing services to the public with limited budgets. Our State and local governments are already strapped. Why should we leave them in a tighter straitjacket?

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

My amendment to section 1983 would add the words "and by any law providing for equal rights" in the place of the ambiguous and broad "and laws" language. The text would then read:

> Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any state or territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and by any law providing for equal rights of citizens or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.

This wording would provide that section 1983 actions be based on deprivations of those rights secured by the Constitution and by those laws which provide for equal rights. Thus, State and local governments would not face the harassment that is sure to follow the decision in Thiboutot, while at the same time, the civil rights of individuals will be protected as Congress originally intended.

OWEN VERSUS CITY OF INDEPENDENCE

In this decision, a dismissed city police chief sued the city, city manager, and city council for violating his due process rights. The Supreme Court, reversing the court of appeals, held that the city was liable to the police chief because its ordinance allowing his summary dismissal was unconstitutional and contravened the Court's holdings in Roth v. Board of Regents, 408 U.S. 564 (1972) and Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972). These decisions had been handed down after the actions taken by the city of Independence. Therefore, the district court had allowed a good faith defense because the city and its officials could not have anticipated the Supreme Court's future interpretations of constitutional law. The Supreme Court, however, disallowed the good faith defense and held the city liable even though it had no way of predicting the Court's actions. The Court reasoned that since Congress was silent on municipal immunity, no immunity was intended.

Justice Powell, joined by the Chief Justice, Justice Rehnquist, and Justice Stewart, stated in dissent:

> This strict liability approach inexplicably departs from this court's prior decisions under section 1983 and runs counter to the concerns of the 42d Congress when it enacted the statute. The court's ruling also ignores the vast weight of common-law precedent as well as the current state of municipal immunity.

The dissenters also noted that—

> Municipalities . . . have gone in two short years from absolute immunity under section 1983 to strict liability.

CONSEQUENCES OF OWEN

Again, even if we accept the questionable use of legislative history and legal precedent, the policy considerations of this ruling force us to act. The ruling is not only unfair in holding a city responsible for violating a right which first came into existence after the city acted, but it is also detrimental in shackling local governments with the need to predict future Federal court decisions. In this ruling, the Court has administered what could be, for many of our local governments, a fatal dose of municipal immobilization.

While the Court could find no reason for any immunity for local governments, it has given numerous reasons for immunity to government officials such as judges, police officers, school board members, prison officials, and prosecutors. In Owen, the Court stated that—

> We concluded that overriding considerations of public policy nevertheless demanded that the official be given a measure of protection from personal liability

The Court's justification for individual immunity was—

> That the threat of personal monetary liability will introduce an unwarranted and unconscionable consideration into the decision making process, thus paralyzing the governing official's decisiveness and destorting his judgment on matters of public policy.

Justice Harlan also listed reasons for granting immunity to government officials:

> Officials of government should be free to exercise their duties unembarrassed by the fear of damage suits in respect of acts done in the course of those duties—suits which would consume time and energies which would otherwise be devoted to government service . . . Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564.

The Court stated that these considerations did not apply when the damage award comes from the public treasury instead of the official's pocket.

With such reasoning, the Court must assume that our State and local governments are guided by irresponsible individuals who would be prudent with their own money but would not flinch at the risk of depleting the public treasury. This type of official is not characteristic of the men and women I have associated with, in Utah and throughout the country, who take seriously their trust over the taxpayer's money. State and local leaders like these will be forced to continually look over their shoulder and into the mind of the Federal judiciary to determine future decisions—lest ruinous judgments threaten municipal solvency. Each decision will be made with constant consideration of section 1983 liability, and officials will no doubt feel the pressure of accountability to citizens and colleagues for costly judgments. Also, small towns, where retained counsel is an unaffordable luxury, will now be forced to cut back on services to try to protect themselves by retaining counsel. Do all these concerns not introduce "an unwarranted and unconscionable consideration into the decisionmaking process?" Since a municipality's actions are essentially the actions of its chief officials and since most of our local officials are conscientious in their stewardship over public funds, I see little logic in distinguishing between the actions of the municipality and the acts of the individual officials: therefore, the dire effects that the Court sees in a lack of immunity for an individual official also apply to the lack of municipal immunity.

The Court also reasoned that the municipality's liability for constitutional violations is a proper concern of its officials. I certainly agree that the constitutional rights of individuals should be of the utmost concern in the decisions of municipalities and that they should be liable for violations of existing constitutional rights, but I do not agree that municipalities should be immobilized by rights that have not been invented yet. I do not think that the Supreme Court itself could predict future constitutional rights—in the Owen case, for example, four justices found no constitutional violation while five found that there was a violation. Local governments will need more than counsel, they will need a crystal ball.

Furthermore, the doctrine of separation of powers provides that some Government decisions should be insulated from review by the courts. A costly damage judgment or court-ordered spending, where officials have acted in good faith, represents a needless intrusion into municipal decision-making. As Justice Powell noted in Owen:

> The allocation of public resources and the operational policies of the government itself are activities that lie peculiarly within the competence of the executive and legislative, bodies. When charting those policies, a local official should not have to gauge his employer's possible liability under section 1983 if he incorrectly—though reasonably and in good faith—forecasts the course of constitutional law. Excessive judicial intrusion into such decisions can only distort municipal decision-making and discredit the courts. Qualified immunity would provide presumptive protection for discretionary acts, while still leaving the municipality liable for bad faith or unreasonable constitutional deprivations.

Another problem, as Justice Powell pointed out, is that the Court's decision in this case is completely out of step with the prevailing situation of the law of municipal immunity in the States. Most States have some form of immunity, the most common being a qualified immunity. Only five States practice the form of blanket immunity introduced by the Court in Owen.

Finally, Judge Learned Hand once observed:

> To submit all officials, the innocent as well as the guilty to the burden of a trial and to the inevitable danger of its outcome, would dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties. Again and again, the public interest calls for action which may turn out to be founded on a mistake, in the face of which an official may later find himself hard put to it to satisfy a jury of his good faith. There must indeed be a means of punishing public officers who have been truant at their duties; but that is quite another matter from exposing such as have been honestly mistaken to suit by anyone who has suffered from their errors. As is so often the case, the answer must be found in a balance between the evils inevitable in either alternative. In this instance it has been thought in the end better to leave unredressed the wrongs done by dishonest officers than to subject those who try to do their duty to the constant dread of retaliation. Gegoire v. Biddle, 177F. 2d 579, 581. Quoted in Barr v. Matteo.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

In its Owen decision, the Court provides for municipal liability because Congress had not provided for municipal immunity. The second amendment which I propose today will provide that municipalities and other political subdivisions of States shall have a good faith defense in section 1983 actions. This new section on the liability of political subdivisions will read:

> No civil action may be brought against a political subdivision of a State under this section if the political subdivision acted in good faith with a reasonable belief that the actions of the political subdivision were not in violation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution or by laws providing for equal rights of citizens or persons.

Section 1983 will continue to allow recovery when there had been an intentional or bad faith violation by the municipality, or, in other words, when officials "knew or should have known that their conduct violated the constitutional norm." (Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S., a 562.) Municipalities will be protected when they have acted in good faith. This amendment strikes an equitable balance between two very important considerations—the constitutional rights of individuals and the ability of local governments to serve all the people.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Over the past 20 to 25 years, a stark discrepancy has existed as to which statute of limitations should be utilized for civil rights violations. Federal judges have virtually vacilated from one end of the spectrum to the other. One court requires the application of the limitation of the State wherein the alleged violation occurred (Briley v. California, 564 F.2d 849; Jennings v. Shuman, 567 F.2d 1213), while another court demands the application of the statute of limitations of the forum State, or the State wherein the civil rights violation was adjudicated (Jones v. Bales, 480 F.2d 805). Such incongruency and unpredictability by the judicial system on this matter has led many on a search for a resolution; a resolution that would bring order and uniformity to the present lack thereof.

The "rule" generally adhered to by the Federal courts is to use the limitation of the State wherein the violation was perpetrated (Jennings v. Shuman, 567 F.2d 1213); this alone, however, poses a major problem. Present State limitations extend all the way from 180 days (Warren v. Norman Realty Co., 375 F.Supp. 478), to 15 years (Graffals Gonzalez v. Garcia Santiago, 550 F.2d 687), depending on the location and the offense. For example, if one were to be tried for a civil rights infringement in Alabama, a 1-year statute of limitations would most likely be used (Boshell v. Alabama Mental Health Board, 473 F.2d 1369); if tried in Louisiana, the general 10-year "catch-all" limitation could be applied (Heyn v. Board of Supervisors, 417 F.Supp. 603); if in the commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the variability of a 1-year to a 15-year limitation would be entirely possible Graffals Gonzalez v. Garcia Santiago, 550 F.2d 687); and finally, in Colorado, in light of the fact that no statute of limitations has officially been declared for some offenses, the sky could essentially be the limit (Salazar v. Dowd, 256 F. Supp. 220).

In referring to a thoroughly prepared analysis by Mr. Daniel E. Feld, J.D., entitled, "What Statute of Limitations is Applicable to Civil Rights Action Brought Under 42 U.S.C.S. Section 1983," we find that fortunately, some States, seeking to establish a common ground whereon litigants of all section 1983 cases can meet, have adopted a single limitation, thus providing a most needed element of certainty and uniformity. Other States, however, have chosen varying statutes of limitations for 1983 cases, "Depending on the facts of the case" (American Law Reports, vol. 45, p. 553). Such indecision has overwhelmed our already encumbered court system requiring virtually a separate ruling for each individual suit.

I draw your attention now to three vividly representative cases that have recently been adjudicated. The lack of judicial limitation uniformity when rendering a final opinion will become blatantly obvious. The first two cases I present successively to show the lack of direct correlation between the decisions.

A 1978 Pennsylvania U.S. District Court ruling held that, for charges of alleged malicious apprehension and prosecution, the Pennsylvania 1-year statute of limitations was correctly applied (Kedra v. Philadelphia, 454 F.Supp. 652). As contradictory as it may seem, an identical case was filed in the Third Circuit Court of Appeals challenging the 6-year statute of limitations in New Jersey for similar civil rights violations. The New Jersey 6-year limitation was upheld (Butler v. Sinn, 423 F.2d 1116), justifiably casting doubt upon the Pennsylvania 1-year limitation.

Questions quickly arise in one's mind. First, who is right? Second, how can such disparity exist for similar offenses? And third, can such incongruency between State statutes lead to an orderly consideration of limitation suits on the Federal level?

Allow me to cite a final case that will further leave us groping for stability and a solid foundation to which we can refer for security.

An alleged constitutional rights infringement was adjudicated in the Second District Circuit Court of Appeals. The court stated, and I quote, "that a section 1983 complaint may contain more than one cause of action and thus may require the borrowing and the application of more than one State statute of limitations" (Williams v. Walsh, 558 F.2d 667).

Where is the necessary predictability, stability, and uniformity that will allow our court system to be freed of the onerous burden of hearing each individual case, and then subsequently try to determine the correct statute of limitations to apply from the existing diverse possibilities? As rhetorical as this question may appear, the situation irrefutably exists.

In view of the difficulties of uncertainty and unpredictability, not to mention the vagaries of fruitless litigation, over an issue easily decided by a simple exercise of legislative line-drawing, I propose an 18-month statute of limitations for all section 1983 violations. Given the current inconsistencies, plaintiffs, defendants, and the courts alike would benefit from the creation of a uniform statute of limitations.

EXHAUSTION

Another section 1983 problem that demands a resolution is the apparent overzealousness of the Federal courts to rule on cases that were initially to be reserved for States and their adjudicatory processes.

During the proposal and subsequent enactment of the Ku Klux Act of 1871, presently represented in the 42 U.S.C. 1983 language, Gen. James A. Garfield, a major spokesman on the subject, supported the bill as "so guarded as to preserve intact the autonomy of the States, the machinery of the State governments, and the municipal organizations established under State laws."

The framers of the Constitution, after having been subjected to stringent controls of an authoritative English monarch, established a division of powers doctrine that was to be inherent in the success of a demoractic republic.

The venerable Justice Frankfurter grasped the careful balance struck by the 42d Congress when it drafted the 1871 act. The act conferred upon Federal courts the jurisdiction to prevent State officers and judges acting "under color of State law" from denying individuals their constitutional entitlements. When, on the other hand, a State has proven its willingness to enforce those rights, "it is to the State tribunals that individuals within a State must look for redress against other individuals within that State;" 365 U.S. 167, 238. This balance struck in 1871 "reflects to no small degree the recognition that to no small degree the effectiveness of the legal order depends upon the infrequency with which it solves its problems by resorting to ultimate determinations of power;" Id. at 241. This exhaustion provision merely restores the careful balance enacted by the 42d Congress and permits States to execute their role as "primary guardians of the fundamental security of person and property." Id. at 237.

This exhaustion provisions will state that "the Federal court shall not have jurisdiction—in section 1983 suits—unless the person filing such action has exhausted all administrative and judicial remedies available in the courts of the State." Chief Justice Burger and Justice Powell have described how this provision would work in a recent Supreme Court opinion:

It does not defeat federal court jurisdiction, it merely defers it. It permits states to correct violations through their own procedures and it encourages the establishment of such procedures.

In other words, a litigant would still have ultimate recourse to Federal courts to enforce section 1983 rights, but that recourse would come only after the State had first had an opportunity to correct the violation. If the states correction is not adequate, the Federal court would have jurisdiction to take the case and decide the unresolved issues. This does not extinguish any rights whatsoever, but merely redirects the adjudication to State courts in the first instance.

This would have many benefits. For instance, Federal courts would profit from the detailed factual record and earlier legal findings of State institutions. The issues would be narrowed and focused by the time they reached the Federal bench. Furthermore, the States familiarity with its own laws and regulations would facilitate both flexibility to adapt to local needs and uniformity in statewide administration. In the words of a Harvard Law Review article:

Even a limited exhaustion rule would not only serve the state's interest in controlling its own affairs and correcting its officials but could also increase state sensitivity to federal rights and encourage implementation of adequate procedural responses to constitutional objections.

CONCLUSION

Evidently tired of waiting for Congress to break its silence on the intended scope of 42 U.S.C. 1983, the U.S. Supreme Court has rendered decisions in Maine versus Thiboutot and Owen versus City of Independence which will severely impair the ability of our local governments to serve the people, while doing little for individual constitutional rights. It is most essential that Congress let its voice be heard. Justice Rehnquist foresaw such a need in his dissenting opinion in Monell versus City of New York Department of Social Services:

Only Congress, which has the benefit of the advice of every segment of this diverse Nation, is equipped to consider the results of such a drastic change in the law. It seems all but inevitable that it will find it necessary to do so after today's decision—Monell versus City of New York Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658,715—dissenting opinions.

In closing, I would like to remind my colleagues of a few observations of Justice Sandra O'Connor when she was still a State court judge. She noted:

In view of the great caseload increase in the federal courts and the expressed desire of the Reagan Administration to hold down the federal budget, one would think that congressional action might be taken to limit Section 1983. It could be done directly or indirectly by limiting or disallowing recovery of attorney fees. Such a move would be welcomed by state courts, as well as state legislatures and state executive officers. 22 W & M L.Rev. 801,810 (1981).

By Mr. QUAYLE:

S. 437. A bill to designate the Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic to be located in Crown Point, IN, as the "Adam Benjamin, Jr. Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

ADAM BENJAMIN, JR. VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION OUTPATIENT CLINIC

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I am introducing today legislation to designate the Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic, to be located in Crown Point, IN, as the Adam Benjamin, Jr. Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic.

This clinic is badly needed in northwestern Indiana. Presently, the Veterans' Administration Lakeside Medical Center, on the near north side of Chicago, is the closest VA facility to my constituents in northwestern Indiana. It is roughly 18 miles from the area, and it is inconvenient and sometimes very difficult for ill and handicapped veterans to travel through the Nation's second largest city to the center to get medical care. The two next nearest facilities, the Westside Medical Center on the near west side of Chicago, and the Edward Hines, Jr. Hospital in west Chicago, are over twice as far from northwestern Indiana.

This new outpatient clinic will mean the end of the time and expense of transportation for travel to these centers and to some of the delays caused by their workload. Further, the new clinic will provide badly needed jobs in an area that, as of December 1984, still suffered from 15 percent unemployment.

I believe it is only fitting and appropriate to name this new VA clinic after the late Adam Benjamin, Jr., who served the residents of northwestern Indiana in Congress for nearly 6 years until his untimely death in September 1982. Adam and I came to the U.S. House of Representatives together in 1977, and it was my great privilege and honor to work with him. Even though we belonged to different political parties, we had many areas of agreement. We were both especially proud to serve our Indiana constituents. I am pleased that our joint efforts on behalf of Indiana were harmonious and productive.

Adam Benjamin's tragically short life was dedicated to helping those in need of assistance. The veterans of northwestern Indiana came to him with a particular problem: the need to assure proper health care in a VA facility reasonably close to home. In November 1981 the House Veterans' Affairs Committee's Subcommittee on Hospitals and Health Care went to northwestern Indiana to determine the need for an outpatient clinic. In May 1983, the Veterans' Administration made the long-awaited announcement that they intended to establish such a clinic in Crown Point. We are now looking forward to the smooth completion of the planning stages of this clinic and to a groundbreaking in early 1986.

Since the VA's announcement, I, along with Senator LUGAR and Congressman HILLIS, who represents Indiana's Fifth District and Crown Point, have been active in monitoring the plans for and progress of this clinic. As these plans move toward fruition, I believe it is only fitting and appropriate to honor Adam Benjamin, Jr., by naming this outpatient clinic after him. Indeed, this clinic will stand as a symbol for all Adam stood for and of his indefatigable work on behalf of those he represented. This outpatient clinic will serve to honor a dedicated public servant who is sorely missed.●

By Mr. FORD (for himself and Mr. MCCONNELL):

S. 441. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to revise the withholding rules relating to certain parimutuel wagering payouts; to the Committee on Finance.

PARIMUTUEL WITHHOLDING

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to correct an inequity in the Internal Revenue Code which for the past 8 years has caused serious, unreasonable problems for a segment of the taxpaying public as well as for productive and worthwhile industry. This legislation would modify the current parimutuel withholding tax.

Horse racing is a sport and recreation activity in 37 States; a business which rightfully prides itself on the double accomplishment of entertaining some 80 million fans each year while contributing billions of dollars annually to State economies through employment, direct tax payments and the purchases of goods and services by its racetrack and breeding farm segments.

Parimutuel withholding is a unique aspect of this unique industry. This preliminary tax payment was instituted in 1977 at the suggestion of the Treasury Department, which claimed many bettors were winning substantial amounts of money at racetracks, but not reporting the proceeds on their income tax forms. As a result, an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code was made requiring the withholding of 20 percent of any racetrack payout which exceeded $1,000 at odds of at least 300 to 1.

The parimutuel withholding law was built on a foundation of shaky assumptions and inaccurate estimates. Because of that, it has failed to produce revenue for our Government remotely approaching the amounts originally estimated. Instead it has subjected taxpayers to a totally unwarranted withholding of their money, made it nearly impossible for them to get those dollars back, and at the same time, severely hurt the racing and breeding business so important to my State and others.

For the taxpayer, parimutuel patrons are not net winners in their wagering efforts at the races, regardless of receiving an occasional payout on which there is withholding. Thus, they do not owe any taxes. What's more, the taxpayers must itemize deductions in order to claim legitimate offsetting losses to this isolated gain and recoup the tax dollars lost through withholding, a choice which usually is not practical and is almost always impossible for lower income individuals.

Finally, if itemizing is possible, the IRS standards for substantiating these losses are complex and unreasonable, to the point where complying with them would require a fan to bring an accountant along to document the activities of each day at the races.

It is also a fact that a reporting system has always been in place at racetracks, and remains so today, which informs IRS of large payouts without the need for withholding.

The damages to these taxpayers, the business and the States in which it exists are far from inconsequential. According to estimates developed by the American Horse Council, racing patrons are forced to relinquish $67 million in parimutuel withholding payments each year. Because that money is taken out of circulation, wagering at racetracks drops by an estimated $235 million each year. And that decrease in wagering reduces State tax revenues and industry receipts by an estimated $47 million annually.

The fact that the gains to the Federal Government from this withholding are negligible, especially in relation to this $47 million loss to the States and their horse industry, makes it imperative that we attempt to rectify this inequity.

We are spinning our wheels with this law. We are trying to squeeze tax revenue from people who owe no taxes, at least not for the activity in question, and we then give them almost no recourse to get that tax payment back. At the same time we are hurting the horse racing industry and the 37 States where horse racing takes place.

Considering the inequity and damage associated with this seemingly insignificant measure, I hope my colleagues will agree that it is worth correcting.

The legislation I am introducing will raise the threshold at which parimutuel withholding is instituted from the current $1,000 level to $5,000 in annual increments of $1,000. Coupled with the fact that Treasury today receives very little in the way of legitimate tax revenue from withholding, this phasein will insure that the revenue effects, if any, of the legislation will be truly insignificant.

More importantly, it will reduce the regressive effects of the current law and the negative impact on State and industry revenue while maintaining a withholding assessment on larger payouts, those most likely to represent net income to the recipients.

This correction is worthwhile and necessary. I hope that even those of my colleagues not familiar with the intrinsic beauty and importance of the racing and breeding industry can recognize that this example of counterproductive tax law deserves our attention and action.●

● Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I'm pleased to join with my colleague, Senator FORD, to introduce legislation important to the horse racing industry in Kentucky.

The parimutuel withholding law in its current form is unfair to taxpayers, and the industry. The bill Senator FORD and I are introducing today seeks to alleviate some of the burden individual taxpayers have to bear.

My colleague has outlined the specifics of our proposal, so there's no need for repetition. I believe raising the withholding threshhold from the current $1,000 level to $5,000 is an equitable proposal, one which should be acceptable to the Treasury.

Our bill will go a long way toward reducing the negative impact on the average taxpayer. I urge my colleagues to give this bill their serious consideration.●

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S. 438. A bill to provide a lower rate of duty for certain fish netting and fishing nets; to the Committee on Finance.

LOWER RATE OF DUTY ON CERTAIN FISH NETTING AND FISHING NETS

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would greatly benefit commercial fishermen who use synthetic nets in their operations. This bill would reduce immediately the substantial and costly import duty levied by our Government and borne by U.S. fishermen.

Netting is an important and expensive component of any fishing operation. A large Maine fishing vessel, for example, may purchase over $15,000 in netting during a 12-month period. At current tariff levels, $3,720 of that amount plus 12 cents per pound of netting is paid into the U.S. Treasury. The costs to a large U.S. tuna boat with expensive seine nets can be significantly greater.

Needless to say, this is a significant cost that must be borne by a wide variety of Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coast fishermen.

In 1979, the United States agreed to gradually reduce the very high 20-year old tariff on synthetic fish nets as part of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN). These staged reductions were then delayed 2 years. Thus, the full reduction in the tariff—from 24.8 percent and 12 cents per pound this year to a simple but still substantial 17 percent ad valorem—will not go into effect until 1989. This means at least $2 million in additional costs to U.S. commercial fishermen at a time when they are experiencing stiff competition from subsidized Canadian harvesters and processors.

This bill will help American fishermen compete with foreign fishermen and reduce our $4.1 billion fisheries trade deficit.

It helps offset the mounting financial pressures on U.S. commercial fishermen.

It reduces the inequity created when U.S. fishermen pay higher tariffs than their foreign counterparts.

And it allows U.S. fishermen access to a quality and variety of nets not available in the United States. U.S. fishermen import roughly a third of their nets each year despite the high rate of duty.

We believe that the gradual reduction to 17 percent over such a lengthy period adversely affects 165,000 commercial fishermen from all parts of the country. The reduction to 17 percent ad valorem should take place as soon as possible.

I urge all Members of the Senate who are interested in the health of our domestic fishing industry to join with me and Senators COHEN, CHAFEE, STEVENS, and MURKOWSKI in seeking enactment of this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this legislation appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself, Mr. COHEN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. PELL):

S. 439. A bill to make permanent the exemption from the Federal Unemployment Tax Act for services performed on certain fishing boats; to the Committee on Finance.

UNEMPLOYMENT TAX EXEMPTION FOR CERTAIN DUTIES PERFORMED ON FISHING BOATS

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the last 4 years, owners of fishing vessels manned by a share-paid crew of 10 or less have been exempt from paying unemployment taxes on crew members. That exemption expired on December 31, 1984.

Today, I am introducing legislation that will permanently reinstate that exemption for owners of fishing vessels exceeding 10 net tons and manned by a shared-paid crew of 10 or less. This will correct an oversight in the Tax Reform Act of 1976 by making the treatment of crew members for purposes of the Federal Unemployment Tax Act [FUTA] consistent with the treatment of crew members for the purposes of withholding Social Security [FICA] and Federal income taxes.

A commercial fisherman in the State of Maine is, by definition, self-employed.

He considers himself to be self-employed, and the owner of the vessel on which he fishes considers him self-employed. They both know fishermen do not receive the fixed salary that employees traditionally receive. Instead, fishermen receive a share of the catch, or proceeds from a share of the catch.

If a fishing vessel returns to port with an empty hold, the crew members take home no pay because there is no catch to share. In some cases, these crew members actually lose money because, as shareholders, they must contribute to the vessel's overhead costs. Successful or not, these costs must be paid each time a vessel leaves port.

Thus, owners and crew members share alike in the risks of their profession. Each invest time, energy, and capital. And they succeed or fail together.

Despite this situation, 13 years ago the Internal Revenue Service determined that crewmen should be regarded as employees of the vessel owners rather than as self-employed persons.

This situation was partially corrected by Congress in the Tax Reform Act of 1976—which treated crewmen of fishing vessels as self-employed, rather than as employees, for the purposes of FICA and Federal income tax withholding. The size of most crews, the nature of their financial relationship, and the tendency for most vessels to experience high crew turnover, made this an eminently sensible approach.

When the 1976 Tax Reform Act was enacted, the Maine fishing industry was not concerned about the Federal Unemployment Tax Act [FUTA] because most of the vessels affected by the IRS policy were under 10 net tons in size. Under FUTA, vessels under 10 net tons were already exempted from paying unemployment taxes on their crew members.

Since the United States adopted the 200-mile limit, many fishermen in Maine and other States have found it more economical to move to larger vessels. Many vessels now exceed the 10 net ton limitation and are consequently facing greater financial and administrative burdens due to the FUTA tax liability, even though the program is not well suited for their situation.

The fishing industry is composed largely of small independent businessmen. The turnover of crews and the nature of their financial relationship make it very difficult to meet the kind of reporting requirements intended for larger businesses with stable employer/employee relationships. It is doubly burdensome because many States tax laws mirror those at the Federal level.

I first introduced my bill March 24, 1981, in the 97th Congress. Since that time, Congress has twice seen fit to exempt vessel owners from unemployment taxes—covering the years 1981 to 1984. Without congressional action for 1985 and beyond, vessel owners will be in the difficult position of treating their crew members as self-employed persons for Social Security and income tax purposes, and employees for purposes of FUTA.

This inconsistency should not be permitted. Passage of the bill I am reintroducing today will lay this issue to rest.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this legislation appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall be effective with respect to remuneration paid after December 31, 1980.".●

By Mr. TRIBLE:

S. 440. A bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to create an offense for the use, for fraudulent or other illegal purposes, of any computer owned or operated by certain financial institutions and entities affecting interstate commerce; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPUTER SYSTEMS PROTECTION ACT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, the United States has experienced a technological explosion in recent years. The era of high technology is upon us, and the computer has become a centerpiece of our daily lives.

Unfortunately, the high-tech era has also bred a new type of criminal—one who uses computers to steal, to defraud, and to vandalize the property of others. I am introducing legislation today that would establish Federal penalties for those who misuse computers in this way.

American businesses use some 3.5 million computers. More than 100,000 computers have been installed in the Nation's schools, and personal computers are found in millions of American homes.

The benefits conferred by high technology are immeasurable. However, our criminal justice system has failed to keep abreast of these rapid changes, and the work of businesses and individuals in America is at risk.

To correct this problem, I am introducing the Computer Systems Protection Act of 1985. This bill would make it a violation of Federal law to use a computer to commit a theft, or to damage or destroy information stored in a computer. It would also impose a misdemeanor offense on those who intentionally access a computer without proper authorization.

A number of States have enacted computer crime laws in recent years, and I do not believe that Federal legislation should intrude on areas traditionally under the States' purview. Computer crime becomes a serious Federal concern only when it affects the Federal Government, the federally insured banking system, or interstate commerce.

Last year, the Congress took steps to protect the computers of the Federal Government, particularly with regard to national security and credit-related information. This was a valuable first step in the effort to combat computer crime, and I believe we must build on it by extending similar protections to federally insured banks and entities that operate in interstate commerce.

My bill would do so by making it a crime to tamper with the computers in federally insured financial institutions. The potential for large-scale theft and fraud against these institutions is tremendous, especially given the increased use of electronic fund transfers. Our national and international economic activities must be protected against computer crimes, and my bill would help to ensure the integrity of the banking system.

This bill would also cover computers that operate in another traditional area of Federal concern—interstate commerce.

Mr. President, the need for this legislation is clear. Fifty percent of businesses and government agencies surveyed by the American Bar Association last year reported being victimized by some form of computer crime over the previous 12 months. Total losses from these crimes were estimated at between $145 and $730 million.

It is also worth noting that these figures are almost certainly understated. Many companies might be reluctant to admit that their computers are vulnerable to tampering. According to the ABA survey, many organizations also don't know when a computer crime has been committed and often cannot monitor their own systems effectively enough to detect such a crime. As a result, many computer crimes go unreported and unpunished.

My legislation would also eliminate the many obstacles to prosecution of computer crimes now found in existing statutes. Because of the lack of a specific Federal statute covering banks and interstate commerce, prosecutors must often try computer crime cases under the Federal wire fraud law.

However, there is an inherent difficulty in attempting to prosecute an action under a statute that was written and intended to apply to a different crime. The Department of Justice has already testified that the lack of a specific computer crime statute "could lead to the dismissal of a prosecution, notwithstanding the egregious nature of the offense or the extensiveness of trial preparation, because decades old statutory elements designed to deal with other crimes have been stretched too far to accommodate modern criminality." My bill would eliminate this problem by providing penalties specifically for the use of a computer in committing one of the covered offenses.

The ABA computer crime task force concluded last year that the need for a Federal computer crime statute is clear and unmistakable. This is precisely what my bill provides.

Mr. President, crime has moved into the computer age, and it is time for Federal law to respond. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that a copy be included in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 440

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Computer Systems Protection Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) computer-related crime poses a serious threat to the Nation's economy;

(2) computer crimes tend to cause far higher losses than other white-collar crimes, and therefore create a heavy financial burden on the public;

(3) the Nation's growing reliance on high technology creates an opportunity for widespread computer abuse;

(4) computer-related crime directed at computers which operate in or use a facility of interstate commerce has a direct effect on interstate commerce;

(5) prosecution of persons engaged in certain computer-related crime is difficult under current Federal law; and

(6) the lack of effective prosecution often leads affected businesses to conceal computer crimes, and that no effective deterrent to such crimes exists as a result.

SEC. 3. Section 1030 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) redesignation subsection (e) as subsection (f); and

(2) adding after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(3) This subsection does not prohibit any lawfully authorized investigative, protective, or intelligence activity of a law enforcement agency of the United States, a State, or a political subdivision of a State, or an intelligence agency of the United States.

"(4) For purposes of this subsection, there is Federal jurisdiction over an offense if the computer—

"(A) is owned by, under contract to, or operated for or on behalf of a financial institution, and the prohibited conduct directly involves or affects the computer operation for or on behalf of the financial institution; or

"(6)(A) Notwithstanding subsection (d), in a case in which Federal jurisdiction over an offense as described in this subsection exists concurrently with State or local jurisdiction, the existence of Federal jurisdiction does not, in itself, require the exercise of Federal jurisdiction, nor does the initial exercise of Federal jurisdiction preclude its discontinuation.

"(B) In a case in which Federal jurisdiction over an offense as described in this subsection exists or may exist concurrently with State or local jurisdiction, Federal law enforcement officers, in determining whether to exercise jurisdiction, shall consider—

"(i) the relative gravity of the Federal offense and the State or local offense;

S. 442. A bill to grant the consent of the Congress to the Rocky Mountain Low-Level radioactive waste compact; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSENT OF THE CONGRESS TO THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE COMPACT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am pleased to reintroduce legislation today on behalf of myself, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator DOMENICI, Senator GARN, Senator HART, Senator HATCH, Senator HECHT, Senator LAXALT, and Senator WALLOP, granting the consent of the Congress to the Rocky Mountain low-level radioactive waste compact. This compact has been submitted to Congress, pursuant to section 4(A)(2) of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act (42 U.S.C. 2021d(A)(2)), for the required congressional approval.

Low-level waste is currently disposed of in three commercial shallow land burial sites—in South Carolina, Washington, and Nevada. Up until 1980, these three sites were accepting virtually all of the commercial low-level waste produced in the United States, with no plans on the drawing board for licensing any new sites. The residents of these three sites felt quite strongly that they alone should not be responsible for disposing of all the low-level waste produced in the United States. In fact, efforts were mounted in each of these States to try to close these three sites to out-of-State low-level wastes or, as an alternative, to significantly reduce the volume of waste that the sites would accept.

In response to these concerns, Congress passed the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act in December 1980. In this act, Congress declared that low-level disposal should be the responsibility of the States, not the Federal Government, and that this task could be handled most effectively and efficiently if States would organize regional interstate compacts. Accordingly, this act authorizes States to enter into regional compacts for the purpose of providing for adequate low-level waste disposal.

Compacts formed under this legislation will be responsible for selecting a location for a regional disposal site, submitting a license application to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for that site and, once licensed, operating the site in accordance with the rules established by the NRC. In order to encourage the formation of regional compacts, Congress authorized those regions with approved compacts to restrict the use of their regional disposal facilities to the disposal of low-level waste generated within the region after January 1, 1986.

Shortly after passage of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act, the process of discussion and negotiation among the States began. Shouldered with a new and important responsibility, States set about the task of formulating the agreements called for under the act. In large part, the compact regions that resulted from the discussions have been geographical in character—with groups of States from a given region joining together to address the problem of low-level waste disposal within that particular region.

The Rocky Mountain low-level radioactive waste compact is the result of the efforts of six States—Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming—to formulate a policy for disposal of low-level waste generated within this region. Four of those States—Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming—have formally joined the Rocky Mountain compact, and Arizona and Utah, if they choose to do so, are eligible to join as well.

I do want to congratulate all of those within the Rocky Mountain region who worked so long and diligently to pull this compact together. The issues that had to be addressed were by no means simple to resolve. Beyond that, there were limits on the time available to reach agreement, with the remaining low-level waste disposal sites authorized to close in 1986. With all of these pressures, these States have taken on their responsibilities in a responsible and timely fashion, and for that I would wish to commend and congratulate them.

After I introduced this legislation in the 98th Congress, a hearing was held before the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, in Cheyenne, WY, on January 12, 1984. This hearing, which is available in printed form from the Committee on the Judiciary, provided an opportunity for a broad range of parties to express their views on this compact.

It is now our responsibility to address this and other compacts in a responsible and timely fashion, in order that the States may get on with the task of resolving this important issue. I trust that my very fine and close friend and distinguished colleague from South Carolina, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, STROM THURMOND, will feel the same, and I shall look forward to working closely with him and with his staff as this committee moves forward with its consideration of this compact. In fact, Mr. President, I had the good fortune of chairing the first hearing held by the Congress on the low-level waste compacts for the Judiciary Committee, on the chairman's behalf, in Seattle, WA, in November 1982, and I have every confidence that these compacts will be guided by the very able skills of the Senator from South Carolina—who, in large part, is most directly responsible for the progress that we have achieved in this field—for STROM THURMOND was the original sponsor of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to emphasize that low-level nuclear waste disposal has been and will continue to be a subject of considerable controversy. Numerous States are now in various stages or organizing compacts, and parallel efforts are underway in these States to try to locate potentially acceptable sites for low-level waste disposal facilities. As these various efforts move forward, we must do everything we can to ensure that not only are these sites safe to operate, but that the legitimate and well-founded concerns of local citizens are addressed. The licensing process established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, which includes detailed substantive and procedural requirements for the licensing of low-level waste sites, is designed to ensure that a site will be licensed only after a determination is made that the public health and safety and the environment will be protected.

In my role as chairman of the Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, I shall continue to exercise close oversight of this process to ensure that all licensing decisions meet this objective. Equally important, Mr. President, is the need to ensure that local citizens have an opportunity to participate in the process and to have their views considered and addressed. This opportunity for the public to participate in the licensing proceeding is an essential part of the vitally important educational process that, in my judgment, is central to the success of this whole initiative. For that reason, Mr. President, early public involvement is essential. Accordingly, I will be continuing my efforts to ensure that adequate opportunities are available for citizens to express their concerns and that, as part of any licensing decision reached, those concerns are addressed and resolved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of this compact prepared by the Rocky Mountain region be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks. In addition, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks. Thank you.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 442

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in accordance with section 4(a)(2) of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act (42 U.S.C. 2021d(a)(2)), the consent of the Congress hereby is given to the States of Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming to enter into the Rocky Mountain Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact.

Such compact is substantially as follows:

ROCKY MOUNTAIN LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE COMPACT

Article I. Findings and Purpose

(a) The Party states agree that each state is responsible for providing for the management of low-level radioactive waste generated within its borders, except for waste generated as a result of defense activities of the federal government or federal research and development activities. Moreover, the party states find that the United States Congress, by enacting the "Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act" (P.L. 96-573), has encouraged the use of interstate compacts to provide for the establishment and operation of facilities for regional management of low-level radioactive waste.

(b) It is the purpose of the party states, by entering into an interstate compact, to establish the means for cooperative effort in managing low-level radioactive waste; to ensure the availability and economic viability of sufficient facilities for the proper and efficient management of low-level radioactive waste generated within the region while preventing unnecessary and uneconomic proliferation of such facilities; to encourage reduction of the volume of low-level radioactive waste requiring disposal within the region; to restrict management within the region of low-level radioactive waste generated outside the region; to distribute the costs, benefits and obligations of low-level radioactive waste management equitably among the party states; and by these means to promote the health, safety and welfare of the residents within the region.

Article II. Definitions

As used in this compact, unless the context clearly indicates otherwise:

(a) "Board" means the Rocky Mountain low-level radioactive waste board;

(b) "Carrier" means a person who transports low-level waste;

(c) "Disposal" means the isolation of waste from the biosphere, with no intention of retrieval, such as by land burial;

(d) "Facility" means any property, equipment or structure used or to be used for the management of low-level waste;

(e) "Generate" means to produce low-level waste;

(f) "Host state" means a party state in which a regional facility is located or being developed;

(g) "Low level waste" or "waste" means radioactive waste other than:

(i) Waste generated as a result of defense activities of the federal government or federal research and development activities;

(ii) High-level waste such as irradiated reactor fuel, liquid waste from reprocessing irradiated reactor fuel, or solids into which any such liquid waste has been converted;

(iii) Waste material containing transuranic elements with contamination levels greater than ten (10) nanocuries per gram of waste material;

(v) Wastes from mining, milling, smelting or similar processing of ores and mineral-bearing material primarily for minerals other than radium.

(h) "Management" means collection, consolidation, storage, treatment, incineration or disposal;

(i) "Operator" means a person who operates a regional facility;

(j) "Person" means an individual, corporation, partnership or other legal entity, whether public or private;

(k) "Region" means the combined geographic area within the boundaries of the party states; and

(l) "Regional facility" means a facility within any party state which either:

(i) has been approved as a regional facility by the board; or

(ii) is the low-level waste facility in existence on January 1, 1982, at Beatty, Nevada.

Article III. Rights, Responsibilities, and Obligations

(a) There shall be regional facilities sufficient to manage the low-level waste generated within the region. At least one (1) regional facility shall be open and operating in a party state other than Nevada within six (6) years after this compact becomes law in Nevada and in one (1) state.

(b) Low-level waste generated within the region shall be managed at regional facilities without discrimination among the party states; Provided, however, that a host state may close a regional facility when necessary for public health or safety.

(c) Each party state which, according to reasonable projections made by the board, is expected to generated twenty percent (20%) or more in cubic feet except as otherwise determine by the board of the low-level waste generated within the region has an obligation to become a host state in compliance with subsection (d) of this article.

(d) A host state, or a party state seeking to fulfill its obligation to become a host state, shall:

(i) Cause a regional facility to be developed on a timely basis as determined by the board, and secure the approval of such regional facility by the board as provided in Article IV before allowing site preparation of physical construction to begin;

(ii) ensure by its own law, consistent with any applicable federal law, the protection and preservation of public health and safety in the siting, design, development, licensure or other regulation, operation, closure, decommissioning and long-term care of the regional facilities within the state;

(iii) Subject to the approval of the board, ensure that charges for management of low-level waste at the regional facilities within the state are reasonable;

(iv) Solicit comments from each other party state and the board regarding siting, design, development, licensure or other regulation, operation, closure, decommissioning and long-term care of the regional facilities within the state and respond in writing to such comments;

(v) Submit an annual report to the board which contains projections of the anticipated future capacity and availability of the regional facilities within the state, together with other information required by the board; and

(vi) Notify the board immediately if any exigency arises requiring the possible temporary or permanent closure of a regional facility within the state at a time earlier than was projected in the state's most recent annual report to the board.

(e) Once a party state has served as a host state, it shall not be obligated to serve again until each other party state having an obligation under subsection (c) of this article has fulfilled that obligation. Nevada, already being a host state, shall not be obligated to serve again as a host state until every other party state has so served.

(f) Each party state:

(i) Agrees to adopt and enforce procedures requiring low-level waste shipments originating within its borders and destined for a regional facility to conform to packaging and transportation requirements and regulations. Such procedures shall include but are not limited to:

(A) Periodic inspections of packaging and shipping practices;

(B) Periodic inspections of waste containers while in the custody of carriers; and

(C) Appropriate enforcement actions with respect to violations.

(ii) Agrees that after receiving notification from a host state that a person in the party state has violated packaging, shipping or transportation requirements or regulations, it shall take appropriate action to ensure that violations do not recur. Appropriate action may include but is not limited to the requirement that a bond be posted by the violator to pay the cost of repackaging at the regional facility and the requirement that future shipments be inspected;

(iii) May impose fees to recover the cost of the practices provided for in paragraphs (i) and (ii) of this subsection;

(iv) Shall maintain an inventory of all generators within the state that may have low-level waste to be managed at a regional facility; and

(v) May impose requirements or regulations more stringent than those required by this subsection.

Article IV. Board Approval of Regional Facilities

(a) Within ninety (90) days after being requested to do so by a party state, the board shall approve or disapprove a regional facility to be located within that state.

(b) A regional facility shall be approved by the board if and only if the board determines that:

(i) There will be, for the foreseeable future, sufficient demand to render operation of the proposed facility economically feasible without endangering the economic feasibility of operation of any other regional facility; and

(ii) The facility will have sufficient capacity to serve the needs of the region for a reasonable period of years.

Article V. Surcharges

(a) The board shall impose a "compact surcharge" per unit of waste received at any regional facility. The surcharge shall be adequate to pay the costs and expenses of the board in the conduct of its authorized activities and may be increased or decreased as the board deems necessary.

(b) A host state may impose a "state surcharge" per unit of waste received at any regional facility within the state. The host state may fix and change the amount of the state surcharge subject to approval by the board. Money received from the state surcharge may be used by the host state for any purpose authorized by its own law, including but not limited to costs of licensure and regulatory activities related to the regional facility, reserves for decommissioning and long-term care of the regional facility and local impact assistance.

Article VI. The Board

(a) The "Rocky Mountain low-level radioactive waste board", which shall not be an agency or instrumentality of any party state, is created.

(b) The board shall consist of one (1) member from each party state. Each party state shall determine how and for what term its member shall be appointed, and how and for what term any alternate may be appointed to perform that member's duties on the board in the member's absence.

(c) Each party state is entitled to one (1) vote. A majority of the board constitutes a quorum. Unless otherwise provided in this compact, a majority of the total number of votes on the board is necessary for the board to take any action.

(d) The board shall meet at least once a year and otherwise as its business requires. Meetings of the board may be held in any place within the region deemed by the board to be reasonably convenient for the attendance of persons required or entitled to attend and where adequate accommodations may be found. Reasonable public notice and opportunity for comment shall be given with respect to any meeting; provided, however, that nothing in this subsection shall preclude the board from meeting in executive session when seeking legal advice from its attorneys or when discussing the employment, discipline or termination of any of its employees.

(e) The board shall pay necessary travel and reasonable per diem expenses of its members, alternates, and advisory committee members.

(f) The board shall organize itself for the efficient conduct of its business. It shall adopt and publish rules consistent with this compact regarding its organization and procedures. In special circumstances the board, with unanimous consent of its members, may take actions by telephone; provided, however, that any action taken by telephone shall be confirmed in writing by each member within thirty (30) days. Any action taken by telephone shall be noted in the minutes of the board.

(g) The board may use for its purposes the services of any personnel or other resources which may be offered by any party state.

(h) The board may establish its offices in space provided for that purpose by any of the party states, or, if space is not provided or is deemed inadequate, in any space within the region selected by the board.

(i) Consistent with available funds, the board may contract for necessary personnel services to carry out its duties. Staff shall be employed without regard for the personnel, civil service, or merit system laws of any of the party states and shall serve at the pleasure of the board. The board may provide appropriate employee benefit programs for its staff.

(j) The board shall establish a fiscal year which conforms to the extent practicable to the fiscal years of the party states.

(k) The board shall keep an accurate account of all receipts and disbursements. An annual audit of the books of the board shall be conducted by an independent certified public accountant, and the audit report shall be made a part of the annual report of the board.

(l) The board shall prepare and include in the annual report a budget showing anticipated receipts and disbursements for the ensuring year.

(m) Upon legislative enactment of this compact, each party state shall consider the need to appropriate seventy thousand dollars ($70,000.00) to the board to support its activities prior to the collection of sufficient funds through the compact surcharge imposed pursuant to subsection (a) of article V of this compact.

(n) The board may accept any donations, grants, equipment, supplies, materials or services, conditional or otherwise, from any source. The nature, amount and condition, if any, attendant upon any donation, grant or other resources accepted pursuant to this subsection, together with the identify of the donor or grantor, shall be detailed in the annual report of the board.

(o) In addition to the powers and duties conferred upon the board pursuant to other provisions of this compact, the board:

(i) Shall submit communications to the governors and to the presiding officers of the legislators of the party states regarding the activities of the board, including an annual report to be submitted by December 15;

(ii) May assemble and make available to the governments of the party states and to the public through its members information concerning low-level waste management needs, technologies and problems;

(iii) Shall keep a current inventory of all generators within the region, based upon information provided by the party states;

(iv) Shall keep a current inventory of all regional facilities, including information on the size, capacity, location, specific wastes capable of being managed and the projected useful life of each regional facility;

(v) May keep a current inventory of all low-level waste facilities in the region, based upon information provided by the party states;

(vi) Shall ascertain on a continuing basis the needs for regional facilities and capacity to manage each of the various classes of low-level waste;

(vii) May develop a regional low-level waste management plan;

(viii) May establish such advisory committees as it deems necessary for the purpose of advising the board on matters pertaining to the management of low-level waste;

(ix) May contract as it deems appropriate to accomplish its duties and effectuate its powers, subject to its projected available resources; but no contract made by the board shall bind any party state;

(x) Shall make suggestions to appropriate officials of the party states to ensure that adequate emergency response programs are available for dealing with any exigency that might arise with respect to low-level waste transportation or management;

(xi) Shall prepare contingency plans, with the cooperation and approval of the host state, for management of low-level waste in the event any regional facility should be closed;

(xii) May examine all records of operators of regional facilities pertaining to operating costs, profits or the assessment or collection of any charge, fee or surcharge;

(xiii) Shall have the power to sue; and

(xiv) When authorized by unanimous vote of its members, may intervene as of right in any administrative or judicial proceeding involving low-level waste.

Article VII. Prohibited Acts and Penalties

(a) It shall be unlawful for any person to dispose of low-level waste within the region, except at a regional facility; provided, however, that a generator who, prior to January 1, 1982, had been disposing of only his own waste on his own property may, subject to applicable federal and state law, continue to do so.

(b) After January 1, 1986, it shall be unlawful for any person to export low-level waste which was generated within the region outside the region unless authorized to do so by the board. In determining whether to grant such authorization, the factors to be considered by the board shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(i) The economic impact of the export of the waste on the regional facilities;

(ii) The economic impact on the generator of refusing to permit the export of the waste; and

(iii) The availability of a regional facility appropriate for the disposal of the waste involved.

(c) After January 1, 1986, it shall be unlawful for any person to manage any low-level waste within the region unless the waste was generated within the region or unless authorized to do so both by the board and by the state in which said management takes place. In determining whether to grant such authorization, the factors to be considered by the board shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(i) the impact of importing waste on the available capacity and projected life of the regional facilities;

(ii) the economic impact on the regional facilities; and

(iii) the availability of a regional facility appropriate for the disposal of the type of waste involved.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person to manage at a regional facility any radioactive waste other than low-level waste as defined in this compact, unless authorized to do so both by the board and the host state. In determining whether to grant such authorization, the factors to be considered by the board shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(i) the impact of allowing such management on the available capacity and projected life of the regional facilities;

(ii) the availability of a facility appropriate for the disposal of the type of waste involved;

(iii) the existence of transuranic elements in the waste; and

(iv) the economic impact on the regional facilities.

(e) Any person who violates subsection (a) or (b) of this article shall be liable to the board for a civil penalty not to exceed ten (10) times the charges which would have been charged for disposal of the waste at a regional facility.

(f) Any person who violates subsection (c) or (d) of this article shall be liable to the board for a civil penalty not to exceed ten (10) times the charges which were charged for management of the waste at a regional facility.

(g) The civil penalties provided for in subsections (e) and (f) of this article may be enforced and collected in any court of general jurisdiction within the region where necessary jurisdiction is obtained by an appropriate proceeding commenced on behalf of the board by the attorney general of the party state wherein the proceeding is brought or by other counsel authorized by the board. In any such proceeding, the board, if it prevails, is entitled to recover reasonable attorney's fees as part of its costs.

(h) Out of any civil penalty collected for a violation of subsection (a) or (b) of this article, the board shall pay to the appropriate operator a sum sufficient in the judgment of the board to compensate the operator for any loss of revenue attributable to the violation. Such compensation may be subject to state and compact surcharges as if received in the normal course of the operator's business. The remainder of the civil penalty collected shall be allocated by the board. In making such allocation, the board shall give first priority to the needs of the long-term care funds in the region.

(i) Any civil penalty collected for a violation of subsection (c) or (d) of this article shall be allocated by the board. In making such allocation, the board shall give first priority to the needs of the long-term care funds in the region.

(j) Violations of subsection (a), (b), (c), or (d) of this article may be enjoined by any court of general jurisdiction within the region where necessary jurisdiction is obtained in any appropriate proceeding commenced on behalf of the board by the attorney general of the party state wherein the proceeding is brought or by other counsel authorized by the board. In any such proceeding, the board, if it prevails, is entitled to recover reasonable attorney's fees as part of its costs.

(k) No state attorney general shall be required to bring any proceeding under any subsection of this article, except upon his consent.

Article VIII. Eligibility, Entry Into Effect, Congressional Consent, Withdrawal, Exclusion

(a) Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming are eligible to become parties to this compact. Any other state may be made eligible by unanimous consent of the board.

(b) An eligible state may become a party state by legislative enactment of this compact or by executive order of its governor adopting this compact; provided, however, a state becoming a party by executive order shall cease to be a party state upon adjournment of the first general session of its legislature convened thereafter, unless before such adjournment the legislature shall have enacted this compact.

(c) This compact shall take effect when it has been enacted by the legislatures of two (2) eligible states. However, subsections (b) and (c) of article VII shall not take effect until Congress has by law consented to this compact. Every five (5) years after such consent has been given, Congress may by law withdraw its consent.

(d) A state which has become a party state by legislative enactment may withdraw by legislation repealing its enactment of this compact; but no such repeal shall take effect until two (2) years after enactment of the repealing legislation. If the withdrawing state is a host state, any regional facility in that State shall remain available to receive low-level waste generated within the region until five (5) years after the effective date of the withdrawal; provided, however, this provision shall not apply to the existing facility in Beatty, Nevada.

(e) A party state may be excluded from this compact by a two-thirds (⅔) vote of the members representing the other party states, acting in a meeting, on the ground that the state to be excluded has failed to carry out its obligations under this compact. Such an exclusion may be terminated upon a two-thirds (⅔) vote of the members acting in a meeting.

Article IX. Construction and Severability

(a) The provisions of this compact shall be broadly construed to carry out the purposes of the compact.

(b) Nothing in this compact shall be construed to affect any judicial proceeding pending on the effective date of this compact.

(c) If any part or application of this compact is held invalid, the remainder, or its application to other situations or persons, shall not be affected.

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds that the compact consented to in this Act is in furtherance of the policy set forth in section 4(a)(1) of the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act (42 U.S.C. 2021d(a)(1)). In order that such compact may be given full effect, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission shall consult and cooperate with the States that are parties to such compact in carrying out this subsection.

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in this Act or in the compact consented to in this Act may be construed as impairing or otherwise affecting in any manner any right or jurisdiction of the United States with respect to the region that is the subject of such compact.

SEC. 4. The right of the Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.

6. If a host state chooses to withdraw from the compact, its facility will continue to be available to the remaining party states for five years so that another facility can be developed.

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. PELL):

S. 443. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that certain fishermen who are treated as self-employed for social security tax purposes shall be treated as self-employed for pension plan purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

PENSION PLAN TAX TREATMENT OF CERTAIN FISHERMEN

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I rise today to joining my colleague Senator MITCHELL as an original sponsor of two bills S. 438 and S. 439 that we are reintroducing and this we are introducing for the first time in the Senate. Adoption of these three measures would greatly benefit fishermen in our home State of Maine and the fishing industry generally.

The first bill, S. 438, would amend the tariff schedules of the United States by lowering the duties imposed on imported, synthetic fish nets to levels already agreed to by the United States.

At present, the import duty on synthetic fish netting and nets is $0.12 per pound plus 24.8 percent ad valorem. Under the multilateral trade negotiations [MTN], which were concluded in 1979, this rate is scheduled to be reduced in increments until 1989 when the flat rate of 17 percent ad valorem will be reached. The bill that we are introducing today S. 443 would immediately reduce the duty to the 17-percent level.

While the U.S. fishing industry holds great promise as an industry that will make larger and larger contributions to the prosperity of this country, that promise has not yet been fully realized. The United States holds within its exclusive economic zone as much as 20 percent of the world's fisheries resources, but in 1983 the industry suffered a $3.6 billion trade imbalance in edible fisheries products.

This trade imbalance is due, in large part, to the fact that imported fish products enter our country virtually duty free. As a matter of national policy, I believe that it is unfair to subject our fishermen, at the same time, to large duties on fishing gear which they must import because domestic manufacturers are unable to provide them with the high quality netting that they need.

Many impediments that face the fishing industry are inherent in the capital-intensive nature of the industry. Large amounts of money must be spent for the construction of fishing vessels and the acquisition of fishing gear. In addition, American fishermen must compete with foreign fishermen who are beneficiaries of an array of Government subsidies ranging from vessel loan and grant programs to subsidized fuel and insurance.

Fishing nets constitute a significant expense to all fishermen. In New England, large groundfish boats may use up to 500 pounds of netting each month while smaller boats may use 500 to 1,000 pounds each year simply for repairs. Depending upon the size of these boats, nets may cost as much as $30,000 and most boats typically carry two or more nets onboard all of the time. At the current tariff level, more than a quarter of the cost of this gear is accounted for by the duty that the U.S. Government imposes on the importation of necessary fish netting.

Because the domestic net companies do not manufacture the quality or variety of netting or nets required by the U.S. fishing industry, our commercial fishermen depend greatly upon imports. Today, we are importing about one-third of the synthetic netting used by salmon gillnetters in the Pacific Northwest, tuna purse seiners in the Pacific, Great Lakes gillnetters, gulf shrimpers, and Atlantic groundfish trawlers. Economists have estimated that import duties on synthetic nets alone may consume as much as 9 percent of the profits made by these fishermen.

The MTN timetable for reducing this duty is simply too long. The principal thrust of the administration's trade policy is to open world markets by reducing the number of barriers to international trade. By lessening domestic trade restrictions, we will encourage efficiency and competitiveness in our fishing industry.

Today, over 200,000 fishermen, with a catch valued at $2.4 billion, are being forced to pay an excessively high duty on the nets they use. In 1982, the U.S. International Trade Commission estimated that only 1,000 persons were employed in our domestic net industry and that enactment of legislation, which was identical to that which we are introducing today, would have resulted in a total loss of less than $6 million to the U.S. Treasury. Since that time, the duty has been reduced according to the MTN schedule so that the loss to the Treasury this year, as well as any possible employment loss, would be significantly less. In view of the overall positive impact that this legislation would have on the U.S. fishing industry and our economy as a whole, I urge my colleagues to join us in supporting its passage.

The second bill that I am sponsoring with Senator MITCHELL, S. 439, today would provide a permanent exemption from the Federal Unemployment Tax Act [FUTA] to those fishing boat owners who are engaged in the halibut or salmon trade or whose vessels are over 10 net tons.

The issue which this legislation addresses is not new. Passage of this bill would end a long effort to correct a very unfair interpretation of tax law as it affects an independent and proud group of working people—commercial fishermen.

In 1975, while serving as a Member of the House of Representatives, I introduced the Sternman's Exemption Act which became a part of the Tax Reform Act of 1976. At that time, the IRS was enforcing an agency ruling which held that certain fishermen, known as sternmen in the lobster industry, could not be considered independent workers but were employees of the boatowners with whom they happen to work.

This view of the relationship of the sternmen and the boatowners could not have been further from reality. For decades, Maine sternmen and boatowners have worked with the understanding that the sternman is an independent contractor. Their relationship was born of both practicality and the independent nature of these individuals. The sternman's competency is respected by the boatowner to the point that he is expected to be able to take control in an emergency situation and, sometimes, fish the boat should the owner become temporarily disabled.

The advent of the IRS's novel rulings in this field have placed a great strain on the resources of the independent boatowners in the State of Maine and elsewhere. It has forced some boatowners to the brink of bankruptcy and others to pursue the very dangerous practice of going out in their boats alone.

The Sternman's Exemption Act corrected this intolerable state of affairs and allowed those fishermen who are paid a share of the catch, and who work on vessels with crews of less than 10 people, an exemption from the tax imposed by the Federal Insurance Contributions Act [FICA]. In addition, the wages received by those fishing boat crew members, whose services were exempted for purposes of FICA, were no longer considered wages for purposes of income tax withholding, and those crewmen were considered to be self-employed for purposes of the Self-Employment Contributions Act.

Under current law, if crew members meet these criteria, boat owners are exempt from social security or income tax withholding requirements.

The legislation that we are introducing today, in addition to giving further recognition to the practice of hiring fishermen as independent contractors, will bring the FUTA into conformity with the other tax acts which I have mentioned. The legislation does not penalize those individuals who wish to work as employees on fishing boats. Rather, it provides those who choose otherwise with an opportunity to prove that they are, in fact, self-employed.

Mr. President, as I have said, the issue which this legislation addresses is not new. In 1978, S. 3080, an identical bill, was the subject of hearings in the full Finance Committee and, in 1980, S. 1194, another identical bill was considered by the Committee's Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management. Final action was not taken on either of these bills.

The first bright spot in this effort appeared in 1981 when S. 791, passed the Senate. The language of that legislation applied the FUTA tax exemption to wages paid after December 31, 1980. Unfortunately, the conference agreement on that bill made the FUTA exemption effective only for the tax year 1981.

The Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1982 provided another temporary extension of the FUTA exemption for tax year 1982 and, in the 98th Congress, as the result of Senate passage of S. 146, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 provided additional, temporary exemptions for tax years 1983 and 1984.

Since January 1 of this year, many commercial fishing vessel owners and operators are, once again, subject to inappropriate FUTA withholding requirement burdens for the wages of their crewmen who are considered to be self-employed, independent contractors for the purposes of all other employment taxes.

The legislation that we are introducing today would correct this inequity and respects the working relationship that has served independent boatowners and fishermen so well in my State for decades. This is important legislation and its passage should be expedited.

Finally, I am introducing a new bill today, S. 443, that would further Congress' recognition of commercial fishermen as self-employed independent contractors by amending the portion of the Tax Code that now precludes commercial fishermen from establishing their own Keogh pension plans.

As I indicated earlier, certain commercial fishermen have been considered self-employed for purposes of FICA since 1977. Last May, however, the IRS Revenue Ruling 79-101 held that the establishment of Keogh plans by those self-employed fishermen is impermissible. This interpretation is not the result of any stated congressional intent, but rather results from an oversight which should be quickly rectified.

In an understandable effort to plan for their future financial security, many commercial fishermen established Keogh plans for themselves when they were first recognized as being self-employed for purposes of FICA. Consequently, the bill that I am introducing today includes a retroactive provision so that any financial penalties which these fishermen may now be subject to as a result of the IRS recent ruling can be avoided.

Group retirement programs are impractical in the commercial fishing industry. Fishermen frequently work on more than one boat in any given year in order to take full advantage of better opportunities on other vessels. The bill that I am introducing today simply provides that fishermen who are treated as self-employed for Social Security tax purposes will be treated similarly for pension plan purposes.

Congress has extended this opportunity to other groups, such as ministers and salesmen who have found themselves facing the same inequitable situation. It is equally important that we provide the same opportunity to those fishermen who are seeking to provide for their own financial security.

This legislation is sound public policy and deserves prompt consideration by the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill, the revenue ruling which I referred to in my statement and a copy of an article concerning the Keogh situation, which appeared recently in National Fisherman, be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 443

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) clause (ii) of section 401(c)(2)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (defining earned income) is amended by striking out "paragraphs (4) and (5)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (2)(F), (4), and (5)".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect as if included in the amendments made by section 1207(e) of the Tax Reform Act of 1976.

(26 CFR 1.401-1: Qualified pension, profit-sharing, and stock bonus plans. (Also Sections 1402, 3121, 3401.))

REV. RUL. 79-101

A fishing boat operates with a crew of fewer than ten individuals who are common-law employees under the usual common-law rules for determining the employer-employee relationship. The crewmembers, however, perform their services under the conditions referred to in section 3121(b)(20) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. As a result, their services are excepted from employment for purposes of the Federal Insurance Contributions Act; their remuneration is excepted from wages by section 3401(a)(17) (relating to income tax withholding); and their services are a "trade or business" under section 1102(c)(2)(F) (relating to the self-employment tax).

Held, the crewmembers are employees for purposes of determining whether an employee's pension, annuity profit sharing, or stock bonus plan is qualified under section 401 of the Code.

[From The National Fisherman, December 1984]

DISPARITY IN TAX LAWS COULD HURT CREWMEN

Thanks to a recent Internal Revenue Service ruling, crew members on commercial fishing vessels now face a Catch-22 situation in regard to self-established Keogh retirement plans.

Under one section of the Internal Revenue Code, those who work aboard boats with fewer than 10 crewmen are considered to be self-employed—provided the vessels involved operate on a share system, as is customary. Such crewmen file their tax returns as self-employed persons and pay self-employment taxes.

According to the law, a self-employed individual is entitled to claim a deduction on all contributions that person makes to a self-established, "qualified" Keogh retirement plan. These plans can be set up directly through a local bank or arranged with the help of an accountant, pension planning specialist or lawyer.

The problem is that in another, different section of the IRS code—one that deals with pension plans—crewmen aboard fishing vessels are identified not as self-employed persons but as "common-law employees," thus making them ineligible to establish (and claim deductions on) their own Keogh retirement plans.

This disparity in law is spelled out in what is known as an IRS "private letter ruling" dated May 17, 1984. It was brought to the attention of "National Fisherman" by a Narragansett, R.I., certified public accountant, whose clients are commercial fishermen.

In the May 17 letter, Alan Pipkin, an IRS official, tells a crewman that although he may be self-employed for income tax purposes, he is a common-law employee when it comes to the pension code. Pipkin cites a 1979 formal IRS ruling to this effect.

The May 17 letter came as a surprise to the Narragansett accountant and may have a similar effect both on other professionals helping crewmen with tax returns and on crewmen themselves. However, according to Wilson Fadely, a public affairs officer for the IRS, the agency's position is not new.

As he sees it, the only tax deductible individual retirement option now open to crewmen is the widely known Individual Retirement Account of IRA. Fadely, however, concedes this alternative is far more limited than a Keogh plan because one can contribute only $2,000 a year to an IRA account.

Apart from that, the owner/operator of the boat on which the crewman worked could establish any one of a variety of pension plans on his employee's behalf. However, unless the vessel owner found a "master" plan already set up by a bank, insurance company or financial firm, he would probably have to bear the administrative costs of establishing one. That done, the boat owner might make matching contributions to the plan or, under retirement funds with different structures, the crewman might be the sole contributor and beneficiary.

Fishing vessel crew members should also note the demise of a provision which once made it mandatory for a vessel owner setting up his own retirement plan to likewise provide for full-time employees with three years or more of service. This requirement was repealed under the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.

Meanwhile, crewmen wanting the flexibility to set up their own Keogh retirement plans face two alternatives. Either they can join together and lobby Congress to amend the existing tax laws, or they can mount a challenge to the rule that now bars them from setting up their own Keogh plans. Reportedly, just a case is now being heard in a tax court on the West Coast.

While crewmen's options may be limited—at least for the moment—owner/operators of commercial fishing vessels have more flexibility. According to the IRS, these individuals are self-employed and may establish Keogh plans as long as they are not working for a corporation they, themselves, have created.

But, even if an owner/operator is an emplhey can contribute each year to their Keogh plans.

The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 did away with the former limit on annual contributions of $15,000 or 15% of one's earned income, whichever was less. This change, of course, means that the more an individual puts into a Keogh plan account, the larger the deduction he can claim on his income taxes.—Susan Pollack.●

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in introducing this legislation today to correct an inequity in current law that prevents self-employed fishermen from setting up pension type arrangements under section 401 of the Internal Revenue Code. This legislation provides that certain fishermen who are treated as self-employed for Social Security tax purposes shall be treated as self-employed for section 401 Keogh and other pension plan purposes. As explained in other legislation that is being introduced today, the issue is how to properly characterize the employment relationship of fishermen who serve on boats with fewer than 10 crewmembers.

In the typical commercial fishing venture in Maine and throughout the Nation individuals come together to operate fishing boats on a "share of the catch" arrangement. The owner of the boat does not pay a salary to the crewmembers of the boat and there is no guarantee of compensation. Instead, each crewmember receives a share of the catch or a share of the proceeds of the catch. Like other self-employed independent businessmen, fishing boat crewmembers bear the risk of their trade, contributing to the overhead cost of operating the vessel and incurring business losses if those costs exceed the income from catching fish.

By the nature of the compensation arrangement and the customs of the industry the individual crewmember is clearly self-employed. He operates independently, moving between different fishing boats, providing for his own needs and carrying the costs and burdens of any other business entity.

Federal law has generally reflected industry custom by treating crewmembers of fishing vessels as self-employed rather than as employees for purposes of Social Security taxation, Federal income tax withholding, and Federal unemployment tax contributions. Crewmembers of fishing vessels that are manned by a share paid crew of 10 or less individuals are considered to be self-employed individuals and thus must pay the higher Social Security payroll tax required of self-employed individuals. Those same crewmembers are exempted from income tax withholding requirements. In addition, under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act owners of vessels of less than 10 net tons have been exempted from paying unemployment taxes on their crewmembers recognizing that the crewmembers are self-employed individuals. The same treatment has applied to fishing vessels that exceed 10 net tons up until December 31, 1984. Legislation is being introduced today to preserve that treatment and I expect that exemption from future taxes will continue.

Unfortunately, Federal pension law under section 401 is unclear as to the self-employed status of these fishermen. And the Internal Revenue Service has ruled, in spite of clear precedent in other Federal law, that these fishermen are employees for purposes of setting up a qualified pension-type plan.

Under that interpretation, the owner of the boat can set up a qualified pension for his crewmembers but they may not establish their own retirement plan. This is clearly not satisfactory because by the nature of the industry, where there is frequent turnover of crewmembers, these fishermen do not work long enough on any one boat to qualify for pension benefits under the vesting standards of Federal pension law.

As a result these self-employed individuals are unable to satisfactorily provide for their retirement. They are able to set up individual retirement accounts but cannot provide for further retirement protection by setting up Keogh or other pension arrangements.

All other Federal law treats the crewmembers as self-employed individuals and it is only fair that they should be treated the same for purposes of providing for their retirement. Other self-employed individuals in similar circumstances such as salesmen, ministers, and independent contractors are able to set up pension-type plans to provide for their retirement; the same rules should apply to fishermen under these circumstances.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

S. 444. A bill to amend the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ALASKA NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator STE-

VENS, I am today introducing legislation to affirm the terms and conditions of a land consolidation and exchange agreement between NANA Regional Corp., Inc., a corporation organized pursuant to the provisions of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, and the United States, acting through the Department of the Interior. The agreement negotiated by NANA and the Secretary of the Interior is, by its own terms, specifically subject to congressional affirmation.

This land exchange will allow the construction of an access road to a mineral deposit that the NANA Regional Native Corp. hopes to develop. At the outset, I want to stress two points: The access road is proposed to be built along the environmentally preferred route. Other alternatives have been studied, a complete environmental impact statement has been prepared, and a consensus exists that a land exchange is necessary to allow the road to be built along the preferred route, across what is now the Cape Krusenstern National Mounment. I also want to stress, Mr. President, that this exchange enhances our own mineral security. Should any of my colleagues oppose this legislation and the exchange it affirms, they will be acting against our national self-interest and our desire to enhance our own mineral security.

This exchange will accomplish three major objectives: First, it will enhance the opportunities for NANA to fulfill the economic purposes of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act by the Development of NANA's Red Dog Mine, a major lead and zinc deposit, and thus provide for the social and economic needs of NANA's shareholders.

Second, the exchange will benefit the Krusenstern National Monument by reducing private inholdings and providing for the consolidation of land ownership patterns and more rational management within the monument. Therefore, the interest of the public in the ownership and management of our public lands is served by the exchange.

Finally, the exchange will benefit the United States by enhancing our mineral security and improving our balance of trade. The development of Red Dog will increase our recoverable reserves of zinc by more than 33 percent, from almost 25 million tons to almost 40 million tons of metal. When in full production, Red Dog will produce 300,000 tons of zinc per year, almost doubling the Nation's annual production. Domestic mines now produce less than one-third of our annual zinc requirements. After Red Dog comes on line we will increase annual production to two-thirds of our requirements.

While the enhanced ability to mine this resource is important to our national security, the ability to market the resource abroad can be helpful in the reduction of our trade imbalance, particularly with Japan. Exports from the Red Dog Mine are expected to total about $250 million a year in current dollars. About a third of the exports will go to Japan, hence the project will be particularly helpful in reducing our staggering trade deficit with that nation.

Mr. President, for the benefit of a complete record, I'll now go into some detail about the project's background.

NANA, pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (ANCSA), selected and received lands containing a major lead/zinc deposit. NANA then negotiated an agreement with Cominco Alaska, a mining company, to develop those deposits known as the Red Dog Mine.

The timely development of the Red Dog Mine is extremely important to NANA if its native shareholders are to enjoy all of the potential benefits of ANCSA. When fully developed, the mine will employ approximately 400 individuals, most of whom will be residents of the NANA region and NANA shareholders. The estimated life of the project is 50 years, and the annual income from these jobs is estimated to be approximately $15 million.

At the present time there is no economic base within the NANA region that can offer even remotely sufficient job opportunities to the residents. As a result, many of NANA's residents are seeking employment outside the region, creating a great deal of dislocation. The development of the Red Dog Mine will change all that.

The Red Dog Mine is landlocked, and it is located northeast of Cape Krusenstern National Monument. In order to develop the mine, an access road and port site will have to be built. A September 1984 environmental impact statement for the project determined that the environmentally preferred as well as economically acceptable route was across the monument.

NANA owns land and conveyance rights in lands totaling approximately 195,043 acres within the monument. While not all of the lands subject to selection by NANA within the monument will ultimately be conveyed to NANA, it is anticipated that substantial acreage will eventually be conveyed.

In order to facilitate access to the Red Dog Mine, NANA proposed a land exchange to the Department of the Interior, whereby NANA would exchange lands conveyed to it and lands subject to conveyance to it within the monument for other lands within the monument. These lands could then be used for the environmentally preferred and economically acceptable access road. All required Federal and State permits would still be needed, however, before the road could be constructed.

While access could be sought across the monument pursuant to title XI of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act [ANILCA], by what in effect is a Federal right of way, title XI remains an untested procedure for obtaining congressional approval of a right of way. NANA believes that a legislated land exchange is the most expeditious manner by which it can receive the right of way. This approach will eliminate the uncertainty associated with a title XI application.

The proposed exchange consists of the following major provisions:

First, a consolidation of land ownership into contiguous patterns that would provide administrative and resource management benefits to the United States and provide NANA with a block of land meeting its access needs.

Second, NANA would receive: First, title to approximately 62,084 acres of Federal lands within the monument and 600 acres of limited subsurface estate, concentrating its holdings at the northwestern and southeastern corners of the monument; second, easements for two winter use trails between Kivalina and Noatak across the monument and other Federal lands; and third, title to approximately 1,915.25 acres outside the monument. NANA would also take conveyance to 31,884.67 acres of lands in the northwest corner of the monument to which it already has vested rights pursuant to ANCSA. This would consolidate NANA's inholdings within the monument.

Third, the United States would receive from NANA: First, conveyance of 1,345 acres of coastal land and relinquishment of selections and selection rights to approximately 103,338 acres within the monument. Coastal land is more important from an archeological standpoint and having this land in Federal ownership is important; second, a grant in perpetuity of an easement and public use and occupancy rights for a 5-acre administrative tract at the Onion Portage Archeological District at Kobuk Valley National Park; third, equitable servitudes and conservation easements for the protection and study of resource values on 10,942 acres of land near Sheshalik—an important cultural resource area along the coast; fourth, interests and easements for the protection and study of resource values within the 65,274-acre block which would be crossed by the Red Dog Mine road. These include protections which are essentially the same as would be attached to an approved title XI right-of-way; fifth, trail easements providing for public access across NANA lands to monument lands; and sixth, for purposes of administrative convenience and to effect the land consolidation within the monument, NANA will take conveyance to 31,884.67 acres of Settlement Act selections within the northwest corner of the monument. This spent acreage entitlement may diminish NANA's potential conveyances within other units of conservation systems within the NANA region.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the exchange clearly benefits NANA by facilitating development of its Red Dog Mine and benefits and protects the interests of the United States. It provides the United States an opportunity to reduce private inholdings in the Cape Krusenstern National Monument, consolidate land ownership patters within the monument, and it resolves the long-term status of major portions of the Federal and non-Federal lands. It provides for manageable land units and gains additional protective and study provisions that might not otherwise exist for park resources on NANA's private land holdings. Easements also are established which provide for general public access to Federal lands and waters and an administrative site is provided at a key location in the Kobuk Valley National Park.

The agreement also protects vital subsistence values. NANA is most sensitive to the subsistence needs of its people and has provided for this protection both in the agreement NANA negotiated with Cominco and in the land exchange negotiated with the Department. Section 810 of the Alaska National Interests Land Conservation Act requires that if an exchange such as this were accomplished administratively, the Agency head or his designee must evaluate the effect of such action on subsistence uses and needs, the availability of other lands for the purposes sought to be achieved and other alternatives which would reduce or eliminate the disposition of public lands needed for subsistence purposes. A subsistence evaluation was prepared by the Department. That evaluation concludes that the exchange will not significantly restrict subsistence uses. NANA's potential development activities will be subject to strict environmental safeguards and restrictions, developed by NANA, in consultation with appropriate State and Federal agencies; significant displacement of fish and wildlife is, therefore, not expected to occur, and any relocation of resources utilized for subsistence purposes will not result in those resources becoming unavailable to the nearby residents. No significant restriction of subsistence uses is foreseen. NANA has provided stringent protections as part of the agreement.

In addition, formal consulation was undertaken with the Alaska Regional Office of the Fish and Wildlife Service and a biological opinion was provided concerning endangered species. The opinion concluded that the Arctic peregrine falcon is the only endangered species in the area of the proposed exchange, and that the exchange is not considered to jeopardize any falcons.

Also, in order to assure that the exchange and the activities resulting from the exchange will not adversely affect properties on or eligible for inclusion on the National Register of Historic Places, consultation was initiated with the Alaska State historic preservation officer and the advisory council on historic preservation. Since the United States acquires lands of significant acreage with cultural resource values, and as a result of the significant restrictions on NANA's development activities, including provisions designed to prevent damage to cultural sites, both the State officer and the advisory council concluded that the exchange would have no adverse effect.

On the Federal level, the intergovernmental review of Federal programs was combined with the review of the proposed exchange by the State of Alaska pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act. The State was advised of the exchange and although the State did not agree that the exchange was consistent to the greatest extent practicable, it indicated that, if certain additional provisions were included in the exchange, it would be consistent with the State program. All but one or two of the suggested changes were agreed to by NANA and the Department and included in the agreement.

The National Park Service, as a matter of sound administrative practice and in order to understand fully the environmental impacts associated with this exchange, prepared a resource evaluation which is the functional equivalent of an environmental impact statement. That evaluation demonstrates that any environmental impacts associated with the land exchange can be mitigated to an acceptable degree and that the essential integrity of the monument's resources and values will not be undermined by the exchange, and instead that resource protection and management will be enhanced in several respects.

NANA and the Department formally advised the Alaska Land Use Council of the proposed exchange and it was given an opportunity to comment. A resolution of the council's land use advisors committee supported the exchange, and the council unanimously approved a resolution supporting the exchange.

Notice of the proposal also was published in the Federal Register advising the public of the availability of draft materials regarding the exchange, of a public meeting to be held on the subject May 1, 1984, at Anchorage, AK, and the opportunity for public comment at the meeting or in writing. Public comment was heard, received and considered by the parties. In addition, NANA conducted village meetings throughout the region accompanied by National Park Service personnel to explain the land exchange.

Mr. President, this proposed exchange is in NANA's best interests, the best interests of the Krusenstern Monument and the best interests of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 444

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. The Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (43 U.S.C. 1601, et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section.

"SEC. 42. The Secretary shall convey to NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in an agreement entitled 'Terms and Conditions Governing Legislative Land Consolidation and Exchange between NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., and the United States,' which was executed by the parties on January 31, 1985, lands and interests in lands in exchange for lands and interests in lands of NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., upon fulfillment by NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., of its obligations under said agreement."●

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague from Alaska had done an excellent job of setting forth the merits of the Cape Krusenstern land exchange, which I strongly support. I would like to make only two brief comments.

The Department of the Interior already has the authority to effect this exchange under the provisions of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1980. Unfortunately, NANA Regional Corp. has been informed in no uncertain terms by certain environmental and wilderness groups that an administrative land exchange would be challenged in court. Delay arising from such litigation would seriously injure NANA, its shareholders, and the other residents of northwest Alaska. We have decided to proceed with this bill in order to circumvent unreasonable efforts to delay or derail the exchange through litigation.

As Senator MURKOWSKI's statement clearly demonstrates, the Red Dog-Cape Krusenstern exchange is a good deal not only for NANA and Alaska but also for the Federal Government and the Cape Krusenstern National Monument. One major conservation group, the National Audubon Society, has already come out in support of the exchange. It is my hope that other environmental and wilderness organizations will do the same. This bill is a test of the willingness of those groups to support balanced, environmentally sound development of Alaska's resources and thus improve the human environment of northwest Alaska.

By Mr. HART:

S. 445. A bill to amend the Price-Anderson Act to remove the liability limits for nuclear accidents, to provide better economic protection for people living near nuclear powerplants and nuclear transportation routes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CIVILIAN NUCLEAR POWER REGULATION IMPROVEMENT AND SAFETY INCENTIVES ACT

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to enhance the safety of nuclear power in this country—the Civilian Nuclear Power Regulation Improvement and Safety Incentives Act of 1985. Representative JOHN SEIBERLING has introduced an identical companion measure in the House. Our legislation makes three simple but fundamental modifications in the so-called Price-Anderson Act:

It removes the current $560 million limitation on total liability for damages to the public caused by an accident at a nuclear powerplant;

It makes the nuclear industry strictly liable for the damages caused by all accidents, regardless of severity. Injured persons would not have to prove negligence in the design, construction, or operation of a plant in order to receive compensation for any injuries they might sustain;

And it eliminates the current 20-year statute of limitations on recovering damages caused by a nuclear accident. Instead, it would permit injured persons to recover for damages if they sue within 3 years after they discover, or reasonably could have discovered, their injuries.

This bill does not in any way alter the other provisions in the Price-Anderson Act, particularly those requiring that a nuclear utility, as a condition of its operating license, maintain either the maximum available private insurance or some other form of financial protection and contribute to a retrospective premium pool should an accident cause damages exceeding that financial protection.

LIMITATION ON LIABILITY

Mr. President, in perhaps its most important—and most controversial—provision, the Price-Anderson Act insulates the nuclear industry—utilities, designers, vendors, and contractors—from liability for any damages caused by a nuclear accident exceeding $560 million. For 35 years, this provision has served as an umbilical cord for the nuclear industry.

By relieving the nuclear industry of the cost of insuring itself against the full range of damages caused by a nuclear accident, this statutory limitation on liability offers perhaps the largest single subsidy granted any industry.

Those favoring the limitation on liability base their argument on an irreconcilable—and fatal—contradiction. On the one hand, they maintain that removal of the limitation would foreclose the nuclear power option, presumably because the risk of a serious accident is too great for the nuclear industry to bear without this protection. Yet, they also argue there is only a slight risk that a nuclear accident ever would cause damages exceeding the statutory limitation. Therefore, they say, the public likely will recover for all the injuries it may suffer, the limitation notwithstanding.

The defenders of this limitation on liability should not have it both ways. They cannot describe the risks of a serious accident as so slight that the public need not worry, but then suggest the risks are so great that the nuclear industry cannot survive without it.

Mr. President, the time has come for us to sever this umbilical cord and wean the nuclear industry.

First, any justification for this limitation on liability that may have existed 25 years ago, when it was enacted, do not exist now.

Although originally intended as temporary measure to nurture the infant nuclear industry, the liability limitation in the Price-Anderson Act has a survival record rivaling that of Rasputin.

In 1957, Congress first enacted the Price-Anderson Act to remove what many say was the major roadblock to commercial development and use of nuclear power. Without the liability limitation, investors, vendors, engineers, and utilities refused to risk involvement in a dangerous, umproven technology. The act was to expire in 10 years when the fledging nuclear industry presumably could survive on its own.

But apparently 10 years was not long enough. In 1965, the nuclear industry sought another 10-year extension. Congress once again agreed. Few temporary laws have proven so permanent.

Mr. President, if the Congress accedes to the nuclear industry's latest request for an extension of the liability limitation, it will wind up nurturing a 40-year-old infant industry. One need only look at its size to realize we are not talking about a babe in arms. The nuclear industry represents billions of dollars of assets and thousands of jobs. It has 80 reactors built and operating, and has accumulated more than 700 reactor-years of operating experience. An additional 70 reactors are under construction.

In addition, the nuclear industry seems so confident in its current technology that it seeks to graduate into a new generation of reactors. It annually requests hundreds of millions of Federal dollars for developing breeder reactors, high-temperature gas-cooled reactors, and magnetic fusion. This hardly requires a crib of liability limitation.

Compare this industry to another risky industry. In 1957, few Americans traveled by air, and space exploration was the stuff of science fiction. Today, we fly on supersonic Concordes and Boeing 767's. Air transportation is a multibillion-dollar industry. Our space probes have explored the far reaches of the solar system, and use of the space shuttle soon may become a commercial enterprise.

If the air transportation industry—with its risk of accidents causing potentially great damages—survives without a limitation on its liability, why cannot the nuclear industry?

Mr. President, the nuclear industry undoubtedly will argue that it would buy additional private insurance if the private insurers would sell it. But currently the private insurers will only make available for each reactor $160 million of insurance against off-site damages. The reason for this minimal amount of insurance is simple: The liability limitation in the Price-Anderson Act removed all incentive for the nuclear industry to buy additional insurance, and for private insurers to sell it.

Consider the response of the private insurers to the accident at Three Mile Island. The nuclear industry always has had to absorb the on-site property damages caused by an accident—and particularly damage to the reactor itself. Prior to the Three Mile Island accident, private insurers for on-site property damages. The utility, contractor, or plant vendor had to pay for any damages in excess of $300 million.

Three Mile Island showed, however, that a nuclear accident causing little off-site damage could still cause substantial damage to the utility's powerplant and other on-site property—in this case over $1 billion.

Because the nuclear industry naturally wanted to minimize the exposure of its assets to such damages, it successfully encouraged the private insurers to increase from $300 million to $1 billion the amount of insurance they would make available for on-site property including the powerplant itself.

If the private insurers can respond with such remarkable speed to the needs of the nuclear industry, surely when the liability limitation has been removed they will respond with equally remarkable speed to the needs of the potential public victims of nuclear accidents.

This disincentive for private insurers to write coverage for injuries to public caused by a nuclear accident underscores a second season for removing the liability limitation: The limitation transfers the risk of nuclear power from those who profit from the technology to those who could suffer from it. If the public were given the opportunity to recover fully for injuries from an accident, the companies who design nuclear powerplants, the contractors who build them, and the utilities who operate them would have far greater incentive to protect the health and safety of the public. This is precisely the type of economic incentive for safety that the Reagan administration would like to see replace direct Federal regulation.

Indeed, the Heritage Foundation, in supporting elimination of this liability limitation, has said:

> Safety would be improved because the insuring companies would have an incentive to work with the utility to improve design and operational safety. This has been the case in numerous industries; the nuclear industry would not likely be an exception.

There is a final reason for removing the liability limitation. This hidden subsidy distorts the market that allocates our energy resources. By enabling it to enjoy below-market insurance, the Price-Anderson Act relieves the nuclear industry of a significant cost of doing business.

The Reagan administration has a penchant for applying a free market test to other energy technologies—particularly when it cuts funding for conservation, solar and renewable energy technologies. Surely, consistency demands it apply the same test to nuclear power. The liability limitation for nuclear power has caused serious inefficiency and waste in the allocation of our energy resources. If nuclear power cannot survive in a market free of hidden subsidies, then we should allocate our energy resources to other technologies that can.

STRICT LIABILITY

Mr. President, although removing the limitation on aggregate public liability may seem the most significant change this bill makes in the Price-Anderson Act, the other two provisions are equally important.

The second provision eliminates the distinction between an extraordinary nuclear occurrence [ENO] and a nuclear incident —two of the most creative euphemisms imaginable. Currently, if the Nuclear Regulatory Commission [NRC] determines, based on the amount of radiation released and the damage to persons and property off-site, that an accident is serious enough to constitute an ENO, then the nuclear industry cannot defend against a damage suit by arguing either that it was not at fault or that it enjoyed some special immunity. The nuclear industry is strictly liable for the damages caused by an ENO.

By contrast, if the NRC determines, based on its criteria, that an accident was not serious enough to constitute an ENO, then regular State laws of tort liability and immunity would apply. The nuclear industry would be strictly liable for damages caused by a nuclear incident only if the State law so provides. Since State laws generally apply strict liability to ultrahazardous activities—and presumably for many States nuclear power would fall within this category—strict liability would often apply even to an accident not deemed an extraordinary nuclear occurrence.

Why, then, should not the Price-Anderson Act mandate strict liability for all nuclear accidents regardless of the State in which they occur?

The ENO distinction implies that victims of "less serious" nuclear accidents should have to meet tougher conditions in order to recover than should victims of more serious accidents. To a person suffering substantial property damage or serious radiation injury, however, it makes no difference whether the NRC finds that an accident was an ENO. The pain, suffering, and other damage remain the same, regardless of the injury caused to the surrounding community. By removing the ENO distinction and applying strict liability to accidents of any severity, the provision redresses this inequity.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Mr. President, the third, and final, provision of this bill replaces with a so-called discovery rule the existing 20-year statute of limitations on suits to recover damages.

Currently, the 20-year statute of limitations applies only to an ENO, while State statutes of limitations apply to less severe nuclear incidents. Since the second provision in this bill eliminates altogether the ENO distinction, this third provision would apply a discovery rule to all nuclear accidents—victims could recover damages caused by an accident if they file suit within 3 years after they discovered, or reasonably could have discovered, their injuries.

Many injuries caused by a nuclear accident are latent. They may not manifest themselves for decades, and often for periods longer than 20 years. Genetic damage caused by radiation may take one or even several generations to appear. Fairness dictates that we not preclude, with an arbitrary limitation, these victims of a nuclear accident from recovering damages simply because they were unlucky enough to suffer latent injuries. This new statute of limitations enables all victims of a nuclear accident to seek recovery for their injuries regardless of whether apparent or latent.

Mr. President, the modifications of the Price-Anderson Act contained in this bill are long overdue. This bill does not pass judgment on the nuclear industry or its prospects. Indeed, conservative groups such as the National Taxpayers Coalition and the Heritage Foundation have also argued for removal of the liability limitation in the Price-Anderson Act.

We must reject arguments used in the 1950's at the dawn of the nuclear age to justify preserving and extending the Price-Anderson Act today. Ultimately, enactment of the Civilian Nuclear Power Regulation Improvement and Safety Incentives Act should benefit the nuclear industry because it will enhance public confidence in nuclear power. If the nuclear industry can survive in the free market without the Price-Anderson subsidy and obtain sufficient private insurance to protect the public, it deserves to survive. If it cannot, then we should invest our energy dollars elsewhere.

There is concern about further reforming the process for licensing nuclear powerplants. I cannot imagine a reform more important than removing the liability limitation and creating a powerful economic incentive for safe design, construction and operation of nuclear powerplants. I believe it is important that we reform current rules of financial protection to insure safer operation of currently operating plants. This legislation will do just that.

Mr. President, I urge the Committee on Environment and Public Works to promptly consider, and the Senate to pass, this important legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 445

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. That this Act may be cited as the "Civilian Nuclear Power Regulation Improvement and Safety Incentives Act of 1985".

LIMITATION ON LIABILITY

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 446. A bill for the transfer of certain interests in lands in Dona Ana County, NM, to New Mexico State University, Las Cruces, NM; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation that will transfer ownership of 4,242 acres near Las Cruces, NM, to New Mexico State University. The land in question has been under the control of New Mexico State University through a withdrawal order from the Bureau of Land Management dating back to the 1950's.

This land is currently being used by the university for a number of important facilities including an antenna range, an observatory, an insect laboratory, and a solar pond. There are many other activities going on elsewhere on this parcel.

I would like to point out that New Mexico State University, which has its main campus located just to the east of this land, is my State's land grant institution. This university has in its land grant capacity served varied interests in my State including a continuing commitment to the tricultural nature of my State's population with special programs aimed at our Hispanic population and our American Indian population.

New Mexico State has long been recognized across our country for its agricultural endeavors, as well as its engineering activities. In recent years its liberal arts program has gained nationwide prominence with its theater and drama department. As this great university has grown during the past three decades it has adapted to a changing society not only in the Southwest where it is located but has also adapted to changes in the United States and in the international arena with its many overseas projects.

With well over 12,000 students on the main campus, the university is large enough to fund major university programs. At the same time, it is still small enough to allow students that individual education that they need so much.

The land that this legislation would transfer is known as "A" Mountain.

Outright ownership by the university of the "A" Mountain lands is justified completely by the tremendous contribution made by the university to America's Space and National Defense Programs alone. Currently, one of the major installations on this land is the Physical Science Laboratory [PSL] antenna range. This is a NASA facility managed by the PSL, and is part of New Mexico State University.

The PSL/NMSU antenna test facility is one of the finest in the world and is used by many Government agencies.

Another user of the "A" Mountain lands which depends upon a clean unpolluted atmosphere is the NMSU Department of Astronomy. While astronomy at NMSU is basically concerned with teaching and research on alternative energy sources, the solar pond is a program relative to biomass and the research needs a greenhouse operation which requires about 30 acres for actual research and control over lands in a 500- to 1,000-foot perimeter surrounding the project.

I would like to quote from the researchers here as to the needs of the solar pond:

Special consideration relating to the use of BLM land for the biomass project are that no tall, solid structures capable of blocking sunlight be erected in the vicinity and that roads accessible to unregulated frequent traffic not be near the algae ponds. The dust of close-by, unpaved roads would be capable of introducing chemical contamination and unnaturally heavy inoculations of the open algae growing ponds with "wild" organisms which, if inoculated heavily, may overcome the biostatic equilibrium of the test and production of algae organisms. It will also be necessary to keep frequent motor vehicle traffic on paved roads removed from the ponds to prevent the introduction of exhaust pollutants, particularly of toxic heavy metals such as lead. A motor vehicle exclusion zone of 500 feet with respect to unregulated, frequent public traffic around the ponds is necessary. Dust-raising and air-polluting activities, in general, must be excluded.

This is important research for New Mexico and the Nation, and we cannot expect the university to continue to make the investment in time, facilities and personnel to conduct this research when this land might some day be pulled out from under them along with the tremendous investment they are placing on this land.

Also, located there is a New Mexico State University insect laboratory related to the livestock industry and wildlife. Because of the large Federal land acreage in New Mexico, research at this lab has great impact. There is no doubt in my mind that this operation will be expanded in future years. This legislation and the land it transfers will allow this project space for expansion.

Other facilities on the land include chemical storage areas, geothermal research holes, radiometers, and a geothermal greenhouse. The activities taking place on this land relate to eight different departments of the university.

It is time for control of this land to be transferred to New Mexico State University. Otherwise the city of Las Cruces, as it grows, could encroach on the land and the capital improvements made by New Mexico State University. That's the major reason the permanent management by New Mexico State University will be of great benefit to our Nation as the current research will continue undisturbed.

I would emphasize that it is time this land be transferred to the university. My legislation includes the conditions that it must always be used for education reasons. That by transferring this land, the best interests of the people of New Mexico and the United States will be well served. Further, I would point out that the university is willing to reimburse the Federal Government for administrative costs associated with the transfer. Further, I would point out that the legislation contains reverter clause language. This means that if the university uses the land for purposes other than research and education, then the land ownership reverts back to the Federal Government. I hope that Congress will act quickly on this legislation.

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 447. A bill to amend the Sherman Act to prohibit a rail carrier from denying to shippers of certain commodities, with intent to monopolize, use of its track which affords the sole access by rail to such shippers to reach the track of a competing railroad or the destination of a shipment and to apply Clayton Act penalties to monopolizing by rail carriers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROAD ANTIMONOPOLY ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today a bill titled the Railroad Antimonopoly Act of 1985. It is similar in principle to the bill I introduced during the past Congress as S. 2416. The goal of the bill is to foster competition in the rail industry and bring fair treatment to captive shippers, and ultimately the public, through clearly bringing the rail industry within the scope of the antitrust laws.

The heart of the bill provides that it shall be unlawful for an owner rail carrier to monopolize or attempt to monopolize by denying or threatening to deny to any shipper or another rail carrier the use on reasonable terms of a railroad facility which is the sole facility over which such shipper can move bulk commodities by rail to connect with the track of competing rail carrier or to reach the destination of shipment.

As a result of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, the industry has been largely deregulated. Railroads no longer operate under the tight regulatory controls that marked their historical development in this country. In the 4½ years since passage of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, two significant changes have occurred which make it imperative that the antitrust laws be amended to avoid serious injury to the distribution system of many shippers which are heavily dependent on rail transportation.

First, there has been a significant reduction in the number of railroads and hence a reduction in rail competition since passage of the act. Deregulation of the airlines and the trucking industry has resulted in new entries and new competition in these fields. Deregulation has thus met the objective of providing the public with increased competition. Deregulation of railroads, however, has led to an unprecedented series of mergers resulting in less competition than ever before.

Second, the Commission has used its power to exempt certain classes of commodities and certain transportation services from regulation to a point where the carefully constructed remedies for captive shippers under the Staggers Act will soon be irrelevant, even if the Interstate Commerce Commission could be persuaded to administer the act the way it was intended.

The result has been that some large volume shippers, heavily dependent on rail for distribution of their products, have less rail competition and an ineffective remedy under the Staggers Act. Another large segment of rail shippers has no remedy at all under the Interstate Commerce Commission because they have been exempted by order of the Commission.

The antitrust laws, as presently written and construed, do not appear to provide adequate protection against abuse of market power. Since 1948, the railroads have been operating under a partial exemption from the antitrust laws. The Reed-Bullwinkle Act (49 U.S.C. 5(b)) gave the railroads, subject to approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the right to act in concert to fix prices for transportation services. Although the scope of this exemption was altered in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 (49 U.S.C. 10706), the partial exemption still remains.

It is true that the courts have held that Reed-Bullwinkle did not modify the Sherman Act prohibition against predatory or anticompetitive practices. See, United States v. B&O R. Co., 538 F. Supp. 200 (1982). Consequently, rates designed to drive out competition from other carriers might well be within the scope of the present antitrust laws. But what of the situation where a single carrier serves a shipper who depends in large part on rail to distribute his products? May such a carrier charge whatever price it desires for rail transportation with impunity from the antitrust laws? May such owner-carrier prohibit another competitive carrier from using its tracks to reach the facilities of the shipper? Does such a railroad have the right to discontinue service if a shipper objects to any unilateral proposals which would be damaging to his business? Unreasonably high rates, discrimination, joint use of rail facilities have all been subject to regulation for nearly a century and have not been subject of antitrust investigations. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the exclusive agency empowered to enjoin railroad rates and practices. Section 16 of the Clayton Act expressly prohibits shippers from seeking an injunction against the railroads in courts.

Under today's climate of deregulation for the transportation industry, both the proponents of deregulation and the railroads have argued that the restraints of the antitrust laws should provide the necessary protection against abuse of market power—not an independent regulatory agency. This is what our amendment to the antitrust laws is designed to accomplish. There is no desire to reregulate the railroad industry but merely to provide the captive shipper with a remedy under the antitrust laws which will prevent abuses of market power.

These abuses are not hypothetical or theoretical. They have happened. Shippers have been faced with demands for unreasonable rates. Shippers have been threatened with discontinuance of service. In some cases, the railroads have taken the position that they are no longer common carriers and, therefore, they have no duty to serve the public. They have claimed that they have an unrestricted right to cut off service unless shippers comply with the unilateral demands of the railroads. Moreover, the railroads have refused to negotiate or arbitrate disputed issues. For example, on two separate occasions, one shipper's business was critically threatened when a railroad called one day to say that, effective the very next morning, it would provide no more service. The shipments involved perishable commodities. The shipper's entire distribution system would have come screeching to a halt without rail service. This happened during the term of an existing contract between the shipper and the railroad. The railroad wanted to extend unilaterally the existing contract. The railroad forced acquiescence by threatening to cut off service with no notice. The shipper had no choice but to agree to whatever terms the railroad demanded.

This type of behavior is unconscionable. The railroads hold the ultimate weapon against captive shippers by threatening to discontinue service. There is no fair negotiation between equal bargaining partners in such an unbalanced situation.

In a largely deregulated environment there are no fair arguments against antitrust coverage. Yet, with railroad transportation there is much confusion over the coverage of the antitrust laws. After years of operating in such a tightly regulated environment, railroads and shippers do not know the ground rules for deregulation. Abuses have been documented. The time has come to make clear that the railroads are subject to the antitrust laws and that certain practices are unlawful abuses of market power.

The bill I am introducing today is similar in principle to the bill, S. 2417, I introduced last Congress. That bill was the subject of hearings in September 1984. I learned a great deal about this issue at those hearings and my desire to continue to press for antitrust coverage of the rail industry was only reinforced. As a result of the hearings, I have refined several of the specifics of my bill, but the goal remains the same: to restore competition to the rail industry and thus provide captive shippers with at least the opportunity to ship their commodities at reasonable rates.

This legislation has received support from many sectors of the economy: the coal industry, public utilities, forest products, agriculture interests such as growers and fertilizer producers, and the perishable food producers. I intend to push for hearings on the bill in the spring, at which all interested parties will be welcome.

I also applaud the efforts by Senators LONG, ANDREWS, and FORD to get at the problem of captive shippers through other means. I support their efforts and believe we are shooting at the same goal but taking different routes to that end. I look forward to working with them toward our mutual goals.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 447

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Railroad Antimonoply Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that railroad rates and terms of service are best and most efficiently established in a competitive marketplace.

(b) The Congress finds that in many instances a competitive marketplace does not exist because of conditions such as those described below:

(1) The source of supply of a bulk commodity is served by a single rail carrier that has exclusive control of the railroad facilities from the source of supply to a point of interconnection with another rail carrier. Beyond such point of interconnection alternative rail routes exist to the destination to which the commodity is shipped, and such routes would be competitive were it not for the monopoly of the originating carrier over the movement from the source of supply to the point of interconnection. The originating rail carrier uses its monopoly to eliminate competition over the entire route and to assess charges or require other terms of service less favorable than those that would be assessed or required in a competitive environment for the movement over its track or railroad facilities from the source of supply to the point of interconnection.

(2) A similar situation exists where a delivering or connecting rail carrier has exclusive control of tracks or railroad facilities which give it a monopoly from a point of interconnection with another carrier to the destination of the movement or to a second point of interconnection with another carrier.

(3) Situations also addressed by this Act exist where a rail carrier has exclusive control over track or railroad facilities and monopolizes movements within the area of its exclusive control, or where two or more rail carriers have joint or mutual exclusive control over track or railroad facilities and so monoploize its use.

(c) The purposes of this Act are to restore, establish, or enhance competition by eliminating the ability of the originating, connecting, or delivering carrier, as the case may be, to assess charges or to require other terms less favorable than those that would be assessed or required in a truly competitive environment.

SEC. 3. The Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 1) is amended by adding after section 8 the following new section:

"Sec. 9. (a)(1) It shall be unlawful for an owner rail carrier to monopolize or attempt to monopolize by denying or threatening to deny to any shipper or another rail carrier the use on reasonable terms of a railroad facility which is the sole facility over which such shipper can move bulk commodities by rail to connect with the track of a competing rail carrier or to reach the destination of shipment.

"(2) A violation of paragraph (1) shall not occur where an owner rail carrier permits, on reasonable terms determined in accordance with generally accepted principles regarding just and reasonable rental of track, another rail carrier offering competing service to use such sole railroad facility. If the owner rail carrier permits such use of the sole railroad facility by a rail carrier and resulting bona fide competition exists for the transportation of the shipper's goods, the carrier transporting shippers commodities shall not be restricted in its rates by any provision of this Act.

"(3) If the owner rail carrier does not offer use of its tracks to a competing rail carrier, as provided in paragraph (2), or if no competition materializes from any competing rail carrier, the owner rail carrier shall offer rates to a shipper for transportation of its bulk commodities over the sole railroad facility at rates which are no higher than would yield a fair return on the proportion of the owner rail carrier's prudent investment in the sole railroad facility that the shipper's traffic bears to all traffic using such sole railroad facility.

"(b) It is unlawful for the owner rail carrier—

"(1) to condition the use of the sole railroad facility upon use of other facilities of the owner rail carrier, or

"(2) to suspend or threaten to suspend service over the sole railroad facility by reason of a shipper's asserting its rights under this section.

"(c) If connection with a water carrier exists at or within reasonable proximity of the first connection with a competing rail carrier, the shipper may elect to connect with the water carrier instead of or in addition to connecting with a competing rail carrier; provided that the cost of interconnection is no greater than would be occasioned by interconnection with the first competing rail carrier, or the owner rail carrier is reimbursed for the difference in cost.

"(d)(1) Any person injured in his business or property by reason of a violation of subsection (b) of this Act may bring an action therefor in accordance with the provision of section 4 of the Clayton Act.

"(2) Any person shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive releif as provided in section 16 of the Clayton Act for threated loss or damage by reason of a violation of this section, notwithstanding any limitation contained in the proviso of such section 16 of the Clayton Act.

"(e) For purposes of this section the term—

"(1) 'rail carrier' means a person or persons providing for compensation railroad transportation in or affecting commerce;

"(2) 'owner rail carrier' means the rail carrier which owns or controls exclusively or jointly a sole railroad facility;

"(3) 'railroad facility' includes all facilities commonly included in the term 'railroad' which are necessary or practical for the movement of commodities over the sole railroad facility;

"(4) 'sole railroad facility' means a railroad facility which is the only facility by which a shipper can move bulk commodities by rail to connect with a competing railroad. Use of the sole facility 'to the destination of shipment' does not include use of railroad facilities beyond the point of connection or points of interconnection;

"(5) 'shipper' includes—

"(A) a person engaged in a business other than transportation who, in furtherance of such business, moves its own goods or arranges for transportation of commodities which it has sold; and

"(B) a person engaged in intermodal transportation who is a purchaser of rail service used in such intermodal transportation commonly called a 'shipper's agent';

"(6) 'bulk commodities' includes bulk goods moved in carload lots, such as coal, ore, grain, fertilizer, dry chemicals, primary forest or wood raw materials, and perishable commodities for human consumption when shipped in service which includes ToFC service;

"(7) 'primary forest or wood raw materials' includes logs, pulp wood, dressed or treated poles and saw mill or planing mill products;

"(8) 'service which includes ToFC service' means service to a shipper who customarily uses transportation by rail or trailers on flat cars (ToFC service) as a part of any given shipment, but does not exclude service to such shipper of some shipment by rail not employing ToFC service;

"(9) 'dry chemicals' means substances identifiable by chemical formulae and commonly described as chemicals, such as soda ash, silica gel, caustic soda, and sodium sulfate;

"(10) 'track of the competing rail carrier' means track subject to the competing carrier's use but does not include tracks jointly used by the rail carrier denying use of the sole facility; and

"(11) 'connect' includes connection from the point of origin, point of destination, and/or point of interconnection with another carrier.".

S. 448. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to encourage contributions of equipment to postsecondary vocational education programs and to allow a credit to employers for vocational education courses taught by an employee without compensation and for temporary employment of full-time vocational educational instructors; to the Committee on Finance.

JOBS TRAINING

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation which will strengthen the partnership between the business sector and our educational institutions in providing needed job training for our work force. This measure is essentially the same as legislation which I introduced in the 98th Congress, S. 108, which passed the Senate as an amendment to the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. Unfortunately, my bill, along with other tax credit provisions, was dropped during the conference session with the House last June. I am hopeful that the measure I am introducing again today, which is in exactly the same form passed by the Senate last session, will again receive prompt consideration and approval by this body in the weeks ahead.

We are well aware that our Nation is going through a time of fundamental economic change characterized by the decline of older manufacturing industries and the rapid growth of high technology and service industries. To remain competitive in a more highly technical global economy, our Nation must seek to achieve productivity gains and to generate economic growth. The importance of capital investment and technological innovation cannot be overlooked, however, we must also acknowledge that investment in American workers is crucial to our continued economic renewal. The application of new technology by industry will require our work force to be highly skilled and continually retrained. In fact, manpower experts now estimate that a worker currently entering the work force will have to be retrained seven times during his or her lifetime.

Yet, public incentives to date have overwhelmingly favored capital and technology investments over worker training as a route to improved national productivity. In 1984, for example, the annual expenditure on training by American firms, according to the American Society for Training and Development, was $300 per worker, versus a capital investment expenditure of $3,300 per worker. I feel that greater emphasis must be placed on providing for a growing and changing work force and that greater support is needed for the Nation's public and private training programs.

An important key to training and retraining our Nation's work force is the community college and technical institute system which spans the country. Offering more than 1,400 different occupational specialty and technician training programs which train over 11 million workers annually, community colleges provides local residents with low-cost access to high-quality training programs. Because these schools can boost a job placement rate of nearly 90 percent, and because they have the ability to change their course offerings and alter training programs to meet local labor needs, community colleges have been recognized by the National Alliance of Business as the "Nation's preeminent adult education system." Members of the business community have a direct hand in community college policymaking because the schools are intimately tied with local businesses through their administration structure. Local industry also participate through advisory committees for each occupational program offered by the community college. The legislation which I am reintroducing today would further strengthen this partnership and aid our country's community colleges and technical institutes in becoming even more effective. My bill would encourage the donation of equipment for vocational training and provide incentives for the exchange of knowledge between industry and faculty.

Technical training programs often rely on expensive equipment which quickly become obsolete in this age of exploding technology. However, the need to train workers on equipment they will operate in the private sector is self-evident. Much equipment in our community colleges has fallen far behind the state-of-the-art. Many States, mired in budgetary pressures of their own, have been unable to make the commitment to meet the equipment needs of their community colleges. I know that in the State of Iowa, for example, funds for upgrading equipment were zeroed out of the 1982, 1983, and 1984 budgets. Iowa's $500,000 appropriation for 1985 will not go far among the State's 20 colleges and technical institutes, particularly when many schools have tremendous needs merely for the repair and maintenance of their old equipment. Furthermore, many colleges across the Nation have found it impossible to expand into the emerging job fields of robotics, laser optics, and other technologies because of the shortage of funds to initiate such programs. My legislation would offer tax incentives to industry to help underwrite the expense of modernizing training programs by donating technical equipment. Current law provides a tax deduction of the basis and one-half the unrealized appreciation—not to exceed twice basis—of equipment donated to educational institutions if used for research purposes. My bill expands the same deduction to apply to the donation of equipment used for vocational training. Although it would be a relatively small investment by the Federal Government, benefits to these training institutions would be significant.

The second part of my bill encourages the lending of industry employees to educational institutions to teach vocational education courses. Community colleges are finding it increasingly more difficult to compete with private industry in attracting and maintaining qualified technical instructors. Some college rely on part-time instructors who are often local practioners, however, industry needs incentives to make greater use of this tool. My bill allows a $100 corporate tax credits for every vocational training course taught by a qualified employee of that corporation, up to five courses a year per employee. These incentives would encourage industry to contribute needed technical instruction that colleges are currently unable to provide, particularly in highly specialized technologies. In addition, this legislation contains a similar tax credit for industry to create work opportunities for community college faculty members in order to upgrade their skills. A $100 tax credit would be provided for the temporary employment of a qualified vocational education instructor by a corporation, thus stimulating the sharing of current private sector technology and expertise with the education sector.

Mr. President, the impact of my bill on Federal revenues would be minimal, yet, this bill would encourage extensive industry contributions of much needed equipment and technical training to one of the best delivery systems for job training and retraining programs in our Nation. I hope the Senate will again give prompt consideration and passage to this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

(3) The table of contents for part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by striking out "personal" in the item relating to subpart A.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years begining after December 31, 1985.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1. Amends § 170(e) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide an augmented charitable deduction for corporate donations of certain newly manufactured tangible personal property to a public community college or public technical institute (within the meaning of § 742(b) of the Higher Education Act of 1965) or an area vocational education school (within the meaning of § 195(2)(C) and (D) of the Vocational Education Act of 1963), which is not a secondary school under state law. The contribution must be made through the governing body of the donee. For purposes of this deduction and the credit allowed by section 2 the term corporation does not include corporations, personal holding companies or service organizations.

To qualify, a donation of equipment must satisfy all of the following requirements:

(1) The property is scientific or technical equipment or apparatus;

(2) The property was manufactured, produced, or assembled by the taxpayer, and is property described in Code section 1221(1), and the taxpayer is in the business of manufacturing, etc., and selling or leasing such property;

(3) The contribution of the equipment is made within six months after the date the construction or assembly of the property is substantially completed;

(4) The fair market value of the donated item exceeds $250;

(5) The original use of the donated property is by the donee;

(6) Substantially all of the use of the property by the donee is for training students enrolled in a postsecondary or nonsecondary vocational education program offered by the donee;

(7) The donor transfers with the property the same warranties normally provided by the manufacturer in connection with a sale of such property;

(8) The property as transferred is usable and functional without need of any repair, reconditioning, or similar investment by the donee;

(9) The donated property must not be transferred by the donee in exchange for money, other property, or services within five years after receipt; and

(10) The taxpayer receives from the governing body of the donee a written statement, signed under penalties of perjury, representing that the use, condition, and disposition of the donated property are in accordance with these requirements (6), (8), and (9).

The augmented deduction does not apply to contributions of computer software, a microcomputer, or any other computer designed generally for use in the home or other personal use.

If all these requirements are satisfied, the augmented charitable deduction allowed for the donation of equipment generally is the sum of (1) the taxpayer's basis in the donated property and (2) one-half of the unrealized appreciation (i.e., one-half of the difference between the property's fair market value determined at the time of the contribution and the donor's basis in the property). However, in no event is a deduction allowed for any amount which exceeds twice the basis of the property, or any amount in excess of fair market value.

This provision is effective for contributions made after December 31, 1985.

Section 2. Amends the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 by adding a new section, § 25A. It would provide a new tax credit to corporations with respect to (1) post secondary vocational education courses taught by qualified teaching employees of the taxpayer and (2) qualified vocational education instructors temporarily employed by the taxpayer.

The amount of the credit generally is $100 for each postsecondary vocational education course taught by qualified teaching employees of the taxpayer during the taxable year (not to exceed five courses per employee per taxable year), plus $100 for each qualified vocational education instructor temporarily employed by the taxpayer during the taxable year. The total of such credits allowed to a taxpayer (or to a controlled group of corporations) for a taxable year is $20,000.

A postsecondary vocational education course is defined as any course of instruction which (1) is offered by an institution of higher education (within the meaning of sec. 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965) as part of an organized education program; (2) is in the physical, biological, computer, or engineering technologies, or electronic and automated industrial, medical, and agricultural equipment and instrumentation operation; (3) consists of a period of instruction which is at least equivalent to a course of instruction that provides three hours of instruction per week during an academic semester; and (4) has been completed before the close of the taxable year.

A qualified teaching employee is defined as any individual employed full-time by the taxpayer for the entire taxable year who taught at least one postsecondary vocational education course part-time at an institution of higher education, does not receive any compensation from the institution of higher education, and was not a qualified vocational education instructor at any time during the taxable year.

A vocational education instructor is defined as any individual who (1) was employed full-time by the taxpayer for at least three months but not more than 12 months during the two-year period ending at the close of the taxable year; (2) prior to this employment, taught postsecondary vocational education courses full-time at an institution of higher education; (3) is teaching such courses full-time at an institution of higher education at the close of the taxable year; and (4) is not employed by the taxpayer at the close of the taxable year.

Any credit allowed under the bill with respect to an employee is in addition to any allowable deduction for compensation paid to the employee by the taxpayer.

This provision is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985.

The foregoing analysis employs the language contained in Senate Committee on Finance Committee Print (S. Prt. 98-169, Vol. 1 at 925-929) explaining similar provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, as approved by the Committee. Those provisions were subsequently deleted by the conference agreement (H. Rep't. No. 98-861 at 1261-1262). It has been modified, where necessary, to reflect changes in language or dates.●

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 450. A bill to establish a commission to study and make recommendations concerning the international trade and export policies and practices of the United States; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND EXPORT POLICY STUDY COMMISSION ACT

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to establish a bipartisan national commission to study and make recommendations concerning the international trade and export policies and practices of the United States. Such a commission is badly needed in order to study the various pieces of our trade puzzle and to make recommendations for solutions to each of these problems. This commission would help to establish a coherent international trade and export policy.

In recent months, much has been written and spoken about the international trade problems which this country now faces and which it is expected to face in the years ahead. There is serious concern about our Nation's ability to successfully compete internationally, and the simple facts illustrate the problem well.

In 1973, trade in goods and services accounted for 8.3 percent of the U.S. gross national product. Today, according to some estimate, trade accounts for almost 12 percent of GNP. According to a Commerce Department study in 1980, 6.2 million American workers owed their jobs to U.S. exports. By 1982, the number had dropped to 4.9 million and in 1983 to 4.6 million, mainly because of the drop in export volume. We export 25 percent of our industrial production and 40 percent of our crops each year. However, despite the magnitude of our exports, they are dwarfed by our imports. Last year, we imported $123.3 billion more than we exported. This trade deficit is the largest in U.S. history.

From 1891 to 1970, the United States had an unbroken string of trade surpluses. Since 1971, however, we have had deficits in every year except two. The cumulative trade deficit since 1979 alone is a staggering $301.9 billion. If present trends continue, we will register a $150 billion trade deficit in 1985.

Our weakening trade posture is not confined to heavy industries. In traditionally strong sectors such as foods, feeds and beverages, our trade surplus dropped from $18.7 billion to $10.2 billion from 1981 to 1984, a 45-percent decline. In the service sector, a surplus of $41 billion in 1981 has declined to $22 billion in 1984, a $19 billion decrease in 3 years. Services decline combined with the large trade deficits have led to an estimated $100 billion current account deficit for 1984.

The future economic well-being of our Nation is clearly linked to the ability of American business to compete successfully in the world economy, and as the above figures show, we are not doing too well.

These sustained record trade deficits have resulted in a serious threat to our economy. These trade deficits have resulted in the loss of millions of U.S. jobs and, if left unchecked, will contribute to continuing troubles for many U.S. industries and cities. More than 1.5 million jobs are estimated to have been lost due to rising trade deficits. From 1980 to 1982, 40 percent of the increase in U.S. unemployment can be traced to the decline in U.S. exports. If these trends are permitted to continue, as many as 3 million Americans will be unemployed by late 1985. Much congressional attention has been focused on these issues, but little has been accomplished. I look forward to meaningful action in the very important area of reducing our record trade deficit.

There are many perceived reasons for our trade failures and even the degree of our failure is widely debated. Some cite looming budget deficits and imported oil prices. Still others have called for trade reorganization as a logical first step. Whatever is ultimately done, I would suggest that action is long overdue.

One further problem which exists, in my opinion, is the lack of a coherent and effective international economic policy. There now exists a serious failure on the part of the Federal Government to work in cooperation with American private enterprise to formulate a coherent and effective international economic policy that promotes trading opportunities for U.S. businesses. In the last Congress, the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee held several days of hearings on these issues and approved legislation to create a new Department of Trade to facilitate the formulation and implementation of cohesive and effective trade policies within the Federal Government. It was hoped by supporters of such proposals that the creation of a new Department of Trade would provide an organizational environment in which effective trade policy could be carried out. I supported this legislation as a good first step, but much more needs to be done to address our trade problems and coordinate our trade policy.

I believe there has also been a failure on the part of large segments of American business to seize trade opportunities. This issue is not directly addressed by Trade Reorganization. Only 12 percent of the Nation's 252,000 manufacturers market their products overseas. Available information, however, indicates that many more small U.S. manufacturers could begin to export if they had the right assistance to overcome impediments in doing so. It was recently estimated that 11,000 small export-capable firms could be induced to try to export if properly approached and assisted, and that the value of exports by such firms could amount to more than $4 billion a year.

I believe we also need to increase our familiarity with foreign needs and cultures in order to compete successfully. As a people, we are not nearly as familiar with other nations of the world as they are with us. Our people trying to do business overseas are hampered by a lack of language facility, a lack of understanding of the economic systems and business practices in other countries, a lack of familiarity with local cultures and customs, ignorance about appropriate marketing techniques and local financing arrangements, lack of understanding about the local economic conditions and trading posture of other countries, and on and on. Because this expertise is not as well developed in our private sector, the Government may also be lacking a skilled cadre of individuals who can give advice or carry out trade policy. The need for such skills, experience, ties, and understanding in the Government and the private sector is paramount.

Mr. President, for these reasons, I am introducing legislation which calls for the creation of a bipartisan national commission to study and make recommendations concerning the international trade and export policies and practices of the United States. The 1-year study is to result in recommendations for changes in laws and regulations which are intended to facilitate the administration of the trade and export functions of the Federal Government, enhance export growth, provide for removal of trade barriers, provide for common understanding of international trade by businesses, develop expertise on foreign business practices and trade issues, and for other purposes. The commission is to be composed of six Members of the Senate, six Members of the House, and six members appointed by the President.

The issues to be studied and reported on include: existing impediments to exporting in American industries—legal, financial, and otherwise—the needs of American industry for information and opportunities to enhance exporting; methods for improving export incentives for U.S. businesses; the need for a closer integration of trade and international monetary policy; the need to coordinate American trade policies and practices with promotion of industrial revitalization; the need for high quality data to identify markets, new products, and industries; the need for directing Federal resources to provide sustained economic growth and employment; the need for cooperation among the principal sectors of the economy; the impact of State and local governments in exporting; the organizational structures of other industrial nations; the organizational structures of Federal agencies; and the need to promote institutional and noninstitutional educational activities that will contribute to the ability of U.S. businesses to succeed in marketing U.S. goods and services abroad. Each of these major issues represent a key area of our overall U.S. trade policy and deserve immediate consideration.

The purpose of the commission is to achieve a better national focus of the various trade problems that affect the United States at this time. A major national study would also provide the opportunity to develop an agenda of recommendations which would help the President and the Congress begin to solve our trade problems.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of calling for adoption of this commission. Given the seriousness of our trade problems and current trends, which show lost jobs, rising deficits, and lost opportunities, we must focus our collective national attention on making trade a national priority. America, once the premier industrial power of the world, is losing its competitive edge. We must stop blindly traveling an unchartered course. Instead, we must begin to fill the gaps in our knowledge and determine the best path for expanding our exports and recouping our position in the world marketplace.

Let us begin this process by addressing the single most important problem in the trade area—the lack of any coherent and coordinated trade policy. This commission would help to formulate such a policy by bringing all the individual trade and export issues into focus and advancing recommendations for solutions.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 450

S. 451. A bill to provide for an alternative to the present adversarial rulemaking procedure by establishing a process to facilitate the formation of regulatory negotiation commissions; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REGULATORY NEGOTIATION ACT

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today a bill that provides for an alternative to the present adversarial rulemaking procedure by facilitating the use of a process call regulatory negotiation.

The current approach to regulatory policymaking has evolved into a very adversarial and litigious process. Affected businesses, interest groups, and regulatory agencies all tend to adopt antagonistic postures during the promulgation and implementation of Federal regulations. Thus, it is not surprising that the policies and regulations that result are often considered inappropriate and ineffective by both business and interest groups and that litigation and conflict have become an integral and inevitable part of the process. The resulting regulatory policy crisis has become so severe that innovative alternatives are needed to encourage a more cooperative and productive process, where as many common positions as possible can be reached and incorporated into regulations.

One of the most exciting and promising new approaches to the regulatory policy procedure is a process called regulatory negotiation. Regulatory negotiation operates on the premise that industry, government, and interested groups can sit down together and with the aid of a mediator, attempt to fashion a consensus in areas of mutual concern. The basic notion is that if responsible people commit themselves to find points of agreement in a cooperative atmosphere, regulations can be designed which better meet true policy needs, and needless conflict and delay can be avoided.

The need for such an approach is apparent. Regulations often create anxiety among the parties who have an interest in their promulgation and implementation. Business often views regulation as limiting its freedom to function as it desires. Other interested groups believe that public welfare is sacrificed in the regulatory process and that interest groups are not represented and not heard in the current process. Legislators, who thought that the problem was solved when they adopted legislation are faced with a continuing battle throughout the rulemaking and enforcement process.

The need for the regulatory negotiation alternative has also been underscored by the Administrative Conference of the United States [ACUS], when in 1982, based on a detailed report prepared by a consultant, Phillip J. Harter, ACUS indicated that:

Experience indicates that if the parties in interest were to work together to negotiate the text of a proposed rule, they might be able in some circumstances to identify the major issues, gauge their importance to the respective parties, identify the information and data necessary to resolve the issues, and develop a rule that is acceptable to the respective interests, all within the contours of the substantive statute.

Attempts to use regulatory negotiation as an alternative have been successful in several areas, most recently in the areas of air transportation and the environment.

First, in the area of air transportation, the Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] is required by statute to promulgate rules and regulations governing the maximum pilot and air carrier employees flight and duty time.

Despite major changes in airline equipment and operation procedures, pilot and air carrier employee flight and duty time rules have remained the same for 30 years. This situation had been the source of many problems for the FAA, disputes between the airlines and their employees, and litigation involving the FAA. Each time the FAA attempted to issue a proposed rule, such controversy would arise that it was impossible for the FAA to issue a final rule. In light of this situation it was decided that it was time to try an alternative approach. It was time to try regulatory negotiation.

Thus, in June 1983, the FAA initiated its first regulatory negotiation project. After completing preliminary discussions with potential negotiation parties a committee was put together of various individuals representing affected and interested parties of the airlines industry. During the course of the summer the committee met regularly initially establishing guidelines for the process and objectives and then actually working toward developing a consensus on the appropriate solution to the problem of flight and duty time.

In February 1984, the committee members were able to agree to recommend the issuance of a notice of proposed rulemaking which had been drafted at the committee's request by the FAA staff. Although there was some disagreement on the contents of the proposed rules, it was published in March 1984, and public comment was received. The public comments that were received were far fewer and less contentious than those that had been received in the past. The comments were circulated to the committee members, and a meeting to develop a final recommendation was scheduled for September 1984. The committee subsequently submitted its recommendations to the FAA, and the FAA anticipates issuing a proposed rule in the near future, based at least in part on the recommendations of the committee.

In the area of the environment the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] has recently successfully completed two regulatory negotiation projects.

First, in February 1983, through the Federal Register, the EPA solicited suggestions for rules to be negotiated by early 1984. After a detailed analysis the EPA selected nonconformance penalties as the first issue to be negotiated.

The purpose of nonconformance penalties is to provide temporary relief to manufacture of heavy-duty trucks or vehicles from engine pollutant standards. In April 1984, the EPA announced its intention to form a Federal advisory committee to negotiate nonconformance penalties, and in May 1984, the committee was formulated. The committee was made up of representatives of small and large, domestic, European and Japanese manufacturers; environmental organizations; State pollution control officials; and trade associations.

The first meetings got underway in June 1984. The committee met several times and formed working groups, which developed position papers on various issues.

On October 12, 1984, the full committee was able to arrive at a consensus on the resolution of key issues, and the EPA anticipates that a proposed rule will be issued shortly.

Second, on August 3, 1984, the EPA announced its intention to form an advisory committee to negotiate "Section 18 Emergency Pesticide Exemption".

Section 18 of the Federal Insecticide Fungicide and Rodenticide Act allows the Administrator of the EPA, at his discretion, to exempt Federal or State agencies from provisions of the act if he determines that emergency conditions exist which require such action. The regulations implementing section 18 were first promulgated in December 1973, and were designed to allow for specific quarantine and crisis exemptions.

In 1982 an EPA audit and congressional study indicated that the regulation could be improved. In August 1984, the EPA held an organizational meeting with potential negotiation parties. A committee consisting of representatives from environmental organizations, users, State agricultural and health departments, trade associations, and the U.S. Department of Agriculture was formulated. The committee met for the first time in September and continued to meet and negotiate for 4 months. The committee arrived at a consensus on the precise regulatory and preamble language on January 16, 1985, and the EPA will be publishing a proposed rule shortly.

In addition to the recent success of the FAA and the EPA, there was also another successful negotiation project involving the EPA, the steel industry and the Natural Resources Defense Council [NRDC].

In May 1982, the EPA proposed in final form a rather controversial regulation on the control of water pollution in the steel industry. The law set July 1984, as the deadline for companies to limit their water pollution to levels at or below those attainable with the best available technology, economically achievable. Of approximately 700 specifications outlined in the regulation, the industry challenged about 30 of them as being based on faulty information. In addition, the NRDC challenged the EPA's use of a bubble concept that would have allowed companies to make cost saving tradeoffs among effluent sources so long as the aggregate pollution result was no worse. Inevitably the matter landed in the courts.

However, in October 1982, the parties began a negotiation process in an effort to avoid the delays and conflicts of litigation. On the other hand, industry was concerned about ending the uncertainty attendant to the incomplete regulatory process, and on the other hand, the NRDC and the environmentalists were concerned with expediting the matter because the steel industry regulations were to be the forerunners to many industrywide regulations.

In a settlement reached in late February 1983, the steel industry won concessions on the technical numbers; the NRDC and the environmentalists won a modification of the bubble provisions; and costly and time-consuming litigation was avoided.

The most well-known regulatory negotiation success story is probably that of the National Coal Policy Project [NCPP]. The NCPP was an outgrowth of the recognition that it was important for the United States to shift from oil and natural gas to coal. In order to accomplish this, there had to be a reconciliation of environmental and industrial interests.

In July 1976, business representatives and environmentalists endorsed the regulatory negotiation concept and agreed to pursue important coal related environmental and energy policy issues using this approach.

The participants in the negotiations used the following principles known as the rule of reason to resolve differences and develop workable solution:

First. Data should not be withheld from the other side.

Second. Delaying tactics should not be used.

Third. Tactics should not be used to mislead.

Fourth. Motives should not be impugned lightly.

Fifth. Dogmatism should be avoided.

Sixth. Extremism should be countered forcefully but not in kind.

Seventh. Integrity should be given first priority.

The Georgetown University Center for Strategic and International Studies [CSIS] served as the neutral meeting place for the project participants. It also raised funds and provided administrative support for the project. The project itself was financed by grants and contributions from foundations, Government agencies, and industry.

Five task forces were established to cover the following coal policy issues: mining, transportation, air pollution, fuel utilization, and conservation and energy pricing. The governing body for the project was called the plenary group and was made up of task force cochairmen and vice cochairmen. The duties of the plenary group were to define the nature and scope of the project, provide guidance, review and finally approve task force recommendations, and resolve task force disputes. Of the 200 task force recommendations 90 percent were unanimously achieved.

The NCPP found that the project was very successful in dispelling sterotypes:

Quite apart from the substance of the recommendations, the project has been valuable in dispelling stereotypes. Those environmentalists who had previously regarded the position of industry of environmental and energy issues as being monolithic and intransigent were rather quickly disabused of that notion. This was largely because of the differing perspectives of the industry members. For example, producers of fuel, regulated utilities and industrial users of larger quantities of energy each tended to have different interests and views on questions of energy pricing.

In similar fashion, those industrialists who expected the environmentalist to be opposed to economic growth and to the introduction of new technology, and in favor of governmental rather than marketplace decisions on the allocation of resources, were pleasantly surprised to find that their suppositions were incorrect. The environmentalists opposed a pattern of growth that produced wasteful use of natural resources and an environmental impact which they felt was unacceptable; they did not oppose economic growth in itself. They welcomed new technology that would serve to increase efficiency and reduce adverse environmental impacts and demands on natural resources. They preferred marketplace decisions to economic regulation by government when markets were workably competitive; when this was not the case, or when important (external) environmental and social impacts were not properly valued in the market, the environmentalists were eager or explore methods of influencing the market (as with emission charges) so that the desired goals would be achieved while retaining the advantages of keeping detailed decisions in the private sector.

The report further stated that:

We are not proposing that the process of discussions and negotiation in which we have participated should replace the adversary process. Indeed many of the policy recommendations on which we have agreed would have to be implemented through the traditional adversary system; that is they require action by legislative and judicial bodies . . . there are others that simply do not lend themselves to negotiated agreements.

We believe, however, that exclusive reliance on adversial processes is likely to produce decisions that are less desirable (from the point of view of either of the parties) than those in which a common position serving both interest could have been agreed to in a non-adversarial context.

The NCPP recommendations have received agency support from the Office of Surface Mining [OSM] and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC]. OSM adopted word-for-word project recommendations regarding bonding concerns and operations; [FERC] adopted the coal generation and small power recommendations.

Two bills were also introduced in May 1980: H.R. 7464 and HJ.R. 7465, which adopted the recommendations that called for the use of incentives to develop pollution control technology and development of plant siting procedures.

In addition to the projects that I have already mentioned, regulatory negotiation has also been tried in the environmental area of toxic substances. The Conservation Foundation was involved in this approach during the implementation of the Toxic Substances Control Act [TOSCA].

Specifically, approximately 13 business persons and environmentalists met to discuss the training of toxicologists, the testing of new chemicals, the prioritizing of what chemicals should be tested and the nature and scope of agency followup on the chemical after it reaches the market. Several valuable recommendations came out of this project.

In addition in the area of labor relations, regulatory negotiation has also emerged. For example, the joint labor management-committee for the retail food industry utilized the process to reach an agreement on an OSHA regulation for protective equipment for employees in the meat department of supermarkets. This consensus took several months of hard work, but once labor and management agreed, the two groups were able to reach an agreement with OSHA.

On July 29 and 30, 1980, the Subcommittee on the Oversight of Government Management, of which I was then chairman, and the Select Committee on Small Business, of which I was a member, held a hearing on the regulatory negotiation approach. We received testimony from representatives of both the private and public sectors who had specific experiences in regulatory negotiation including the NCPP, the Conservation Foundation, the EPA. These witnesses supported regulatory negotiation as a valuable aid to achieving more flexible and workable regulatory policy and suggested ways to strengthen the process.

Essentially the bill creates a process for establishing regulatory negotiation commissions. These commissions are composed of balanced interests in the areas being reviewed. These commissions are to develop proposed rules representing a consensus of the commissions' participants.

The bill gives ACUS and its Chairperson the responsibility for administering the program. A $1 million fund is authorized to fund the program for each of the 3 years beginning in 1986.

Specifically, an agency or interested party may request that the Chairman of ACUS conduct a preliminary investigation to determine the feasibility of using a regulatory negotiation commission to formulate a proposed rule. If the Chairman determines that the commission would be a viable means of developing a proposed rule, the Chairman will announce in the Federal Register, along with the agency involved the intention to establish a regulatory negotiation commission. The Chairman will then accept applications for participation on the commission from interested parties. The Chairman may also suggest that an interested party seek a grant from the Conference if it is determined that the party is eligible for participation but unable to afford the expense of such participation. Grants would be available to not only assist participants but also to cover the expenses of the operation of the commission. A commission could be established to develop a proposed rule in any area subject to Government regulation and conducive to resolution in the negotiation process; however, the decisions to select a particular area for negotiation would be at the discretion of the Chairman with the advice of the agency involved.

The bill outlines the status and function of the parties during the process and makes the agency an equal voting member. The commission would also have the responsiblity of reporting to the agency, OMB, and the Congress on the results of the negotiation.

Upon receipt of the commission's report, the agency must comment on the report and is permitted to amend and modify the proposed rule if it feels that amendments or modifications are necessary. However, it must give the commission and the public an opportunity to review and comment on the proposed rule and any amendments or modifications.

The NCPP and the environmental negotiations demonstrate the vital progress that can result from regulatory negotiation. Yet, despite the promise that this approach holds, its use has been limited. The failure to use regulatory negotiation more frequently stems in part from our traditional reliance on the adversarial proceedings and in part from the possible costs involved in the process.

Expanding the use of regulatory negotiation will require some encouragement from regulators. Private parties need to know that there is a process and funds available to meet the cost of negotiation and facilitate the establishment of a workable negotiation mechanism. This will enable many parties in the private sector to participate in the process who would otherwise be left out; it demonstrates that the Government will take the results seriously; and it ensures that the negotiations will be fairly and impartially structured so that all points of view can be effectively represented. The program envisioned in this bill will give the concept of regulatory negotiation the impetus and the initial funding it needs and deserves.

I view this bill as a unique opportunity to foster more effective and appropriate regulations and to reduce conflict and delay in the regulatory process. I hope that you share this view and that you will join me in supporting it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 451

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Regulatory Negotiation Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that:

(1) Government regulation of the economy has increased rapidly since the enactment of the Administrative Procedure Act.

(2) Although this increase in regulation has had commendable purposes, it has been accompanied by a formalization of the rule making process which has frequently resulted in unjustifiably expensive, contradictory, and often counterproductive rules.

(3) The adversarial nature of the rule making process has often resulted in unnecessary regulations which have a significant adverse effect on the economy.

(4) In the current rule making process, the parties often assume antagonistic positions and the best solutions to the problems under consideration are often ignored by the parties since the parties act in a manner which maintains their bargaining positions.

(5) In the current rule making process, the parties rarely have the opportunity to meet as a group and communicate directly with each other, and the lack of this opportunity effectively limits the ability of the parties to reach agreement on a rule that fulfills the intent of Congress and is acceptable to all parties.

(6) The adversarial nature of the rule making process frequently limits the extent to which the expertise, technical ability, and great resources of persons working in a regulatory area are used to solve the problem under consideration.

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. The purpose of this Act is to establish an alternative rule making procedure which permits the establishment of regulatory negotiation commissions that can be used in appropriate circumstances to permit direct participation of interested parties in a rule making, the negotiation of regulatory policy by such parties, and the development of rules that represent a consensus of the members of the commission.

REQUEST FOR REGULATORY NEGOTIATION COMMISSION

SEC. 5. (a) An agency or a person who is qualified to represent an interest with respect to an issue may request the Chairman to determine whether to recommend to the agency having jurisdiction over the development of a proposed rule with respect to such issue that a regulatory negotiation commission be established to develop such a proposed rule. The request shall explain the reasons why the agency or person believes that the use of a regulatory negotiation commission would be an appropriate method of developing a proposed rule.

(b) The Chairman shall consider each request made under subsection (a) for the establishment of a regulatory negotiation commission to develop a proposed rule with respect to a particular issue. If the Chairman determines that there is a substantial likelihood that the agency having jurisdiction over the development of such a rule will seriously consider issuing a proposed rule relating to such issue, the Chairman may conduct an informal investigation with respect to the advisability of establishing a regulatory negotiation commission to develop such a proposed rule. In conducting such an investigation, the Chairman may consider and make determinations concerning—

(1) whether there are a limited number of interests which would be substantially affected by a proposed rule relating to the issue;

(2) whether persons can be selected as members of a regulatory negotiation commission who would represent the interests identified pursuant to paragraph (1), including recommendations for persons to be selected;

(3) whether the persons recommended for selection as members of a regulatory negotiation commission would be willing to make a commitment to negotiate in good faith to reach a consensus on a proposed rule concerning such issue;

(4) whether the agency having jurisdiction over the development of such a proposed rule would use the regulatory negotiation commission to develop such rule;

(5) the scope of the issues to be considered by the regulatory negotiation commission in developing such rule; and

(6) a preliminary schedule for the completion of the work of the regulatory negotiation commission.

(c) Within sixty days after receiving a request under subsection (a) with respect to the development of a proposed rule concerning an issue, the Chairman shall report to the Conference and the agency having jurisdiction over the development of such a proposed rule the determinations of the Chairman under subsection (b) and the recommendations of the Chairman as to whether a regulatory negotiation commission should be established to develop such a proposed rule.

(d) The Chairman, with the advice of the agency having jurisdiction over the development of a proposed rule with respect to an issue for which a request is submitted under subsection (a), shall have complete discretion in determining the subjects to be considered by any regulatory negotiation commission established to develop such a proposed rule. Any determination by the Chairman with respect to the subjects to be considered by a regulatory negotiation commission shall not be subject to judicial review in any court.

USE OF REGULATORY NEGOTIATION COMMISSION

SEC. 6. (a) If, on the recommendation of the Chairman, an agency decides to use a regulatory negotiation commission, the agency shall publish in the Federal Register a notice concerning the proposed use of such commission in the development of a proposed rule. Such notice shall include—

(1) an announcement that the agency intends to use a regulatory negotiation commission in the development of the proposed rule;

(2) a general description of the subject matter to be considered by the regulatory negotiation commission; and

(3) a list of mediators compiled and approved by the Conference, from which persons applying for membership on the commission may select a proposed mediator.

(b)(1) For a period of at least thirty days after the date on which an agency publishes a notice with respect to a regulatory negotiation commission under subsection (a), the Chairman shall accept applications from persons who are qualified to represent an interest on the commission. Each such application shall specify—

(A) the name of the person submitting the application and a description of the interest such person will represent;

(B) the persons recommended for membership on the commission and the reasons of the applicant for such recommendations;

(C) whether a mediator will be needed by the commission, and, if necessary, the name of a proposed mediator;

(D) recommendations for the issues to be considered by the commission;

(E) recommendations for rules for the operation of the commission;

(F) a proposed organizational plan and a proposed agenda for the commission;

(G) a proposed schedule for completing the work of the commission; and

(H) a written commitment that the applicant will—

(i) negotiate the issues under consideration by the commission in good faith; and

(ii) produce a report on the negotiation within a time period appropriate to the issues under consideration.

(2) In order to ensure that all interests, including interests represented by public interest groups, have an adequate opportunity to participate in a regulatory negotiation commission, the Chairman may suggest that a person submitting an application under paragraph (1) request a grant under section 9 to pay the expenses that will be incurred by such person as a result of participation on the regulatory negotiation commission.

(c) During the period in which the Chairman is accepting applications under subsection (b)(1), an agency which published a notice under subsection (a) with respect to a regulatory negotiation commission shall submit to the Chairman a written statement specifying—

(1) the name and position of a senior official of the agency who will represent the agency on the commission;

(2) whether a mediator will be necessary for the commission, and, if necessary, the name of a proposed mediator;

(d) After the period for applications for membership on a regulatory negotiation commission under subsection (b)(1) has expired, the Chairman shall consider all of the applications submitted under such subsection and the statement submitted by the agency under subsection (c). If, after considering such applications and statement, the Chairman determines that all necessary interests will be represented on the regulatory negotiation commission for which the applications are made and that persons representing such interests will have an opportunity to contribute to the negotiation of a proposed rule, the Chairman shall announce the establishment of such a commission in accordance with subsection (e).

(e) The Chairman shall announce the establishment of a regulatory negotiation commission for the development of a proposed rule through publication of a notice in the Federal Register and through notices in appropriate journals, newsletters, and other media. Such notice shall include—

(1) a description of the issue to be considered by the commission;

(2) a tentative list of the subjects to be considered by the commission in negotiating with respect to the issue described pursuant to in paragraph (1);

(3) the name and position of the senior official of the agency having jurisdiction over the development of such a rule who is proposed to represent the agency on the commission;

(4) the name of each person proposed for selection as a member of the commission, and a specification of the interest to be represented by each such member;

(5) the name of a proposed mediator for the commission, if any;

(6) a proposed schedule for the completion of the work of the commission; and

(7) a request that members of the public comment on the proposed commission, including comments on—

(A) whether each appropriate interest will be represented on the commission;

(B) the persons selected to represent each such interest;

(C) the official proposed to represent the agency; and

(D) the issues to be considered by the commission.

(f) For a period of at least thirty days after the date on which the notice required under subsection (e) is published in the Federal Register, the Chairman shall accept comments from the public with respect to the matters specified in such notice. The Chairman, with the advice of the agency having jurisdiction over the proposed rule to be developed by the commission, shall consider all relevant matter and comments submitted, and may modify the proposal for the use of a regulatory negotiation commission specified in such notice with the agreement of the agency and the members proposed by the Chairman in such notice to represent the major interests on the commission.

(g) The agency shall publish in the Federal Register a final notice concerning the establishment of a regulatory negotiation commission to develop a proposed rule. The notice shall specify the matters described in paragraphs (1) through (6) of subsection (e) with respect to the regulatory negotiation commission that will be established.

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself, Mr. DODD, and Mr. PELL):

S. 452. A bill to enact the Gifted and Talented Children's Education Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

GIFTED AND TALENTED CHILDREN

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce along with my colleagues, Senator DODD and Senator PELL, the Jacob J. Javits Gifted and Talented Children's Education Act of 1985. The Federal Government began its involvement with the education of gifted and talented students over 15 years ago. In 1969, Senator Jacob Javits of New York led the fight for the passage of the Gifted and Talented Children's Education Assistance Act. This legislation, in addition to focusing Federal attention on talented and gifted youth and giving them priority in several Federal education programs, directed the Commissioner of Education to report to Congress on the current status of educational programs for gifted and talented children and the unmet educational needs of these children.

In 1974, Senator Javits provided the leadership needed to appropriate $2.5 million, through Public Law 93-380, to help local educational agencies aid these children. Again in 1978, Senator Javits introduced legislation leading to the passage of title IV-D of Public Law 96-561, the Gifted and Talented Children's Education Act. Appropriations reached $6.3 million in 1980, allowing for the support of many excellent and innovative educational programs.

Since 1980, we have witnessed a major retreat in aid for the gifted and talented. In 1981, at the request of the Reagan administration, the Gifted and Talented Childrens' Education Act of 1978 was eliminated as a separate program and merged with 29 other education program under a block grant—chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act. Funding for the block grant has been cut in real terms by 53½ percent. And in 1982, as a further retreat, the Reagan administration closed the Office of the Gifted and Talented in the U.S. Department of Education. The Federal Government now plays virtually no role in helping schools provide opportunities for the gifted and talented.

Recently, the National Commission on Excellence in Education, in its report, "A Nation at Risk: The Imperative for Education Reform," stated:

The Federal Government, in cooperation with States and localities, should meet the needs of key groups of students such as gifted and talented, the socioeconomically disadvantaged, minority and language minority students, and the handicapped. In combination these groups include both national resources and the Nation's youth who are most at risk.

All of the above groups, with the single exception of the gifted and talented, receive significant Federal assistance.

Mr. President, the needs of the gifted and talented are real. We have nearly 2.5 million gifted and talented elementary and secondary students in the country, but 40 to 60 percent of this population has never even been identified. Further, 50 percent of the identified students achieve below their ability level, and only 20 percent of the teachers in gifted education are properly trained to design curriculum for these students. Despite the popular notion that our gifted and talented children will succeed on their own, many need services not readily available through regular school programs.

In New Jersey there are presently 61,000 school age children who have been specifically identified as gifted and talented and are receiving supplemental services of some kind. Few of these children receive all that they deserve and thousands more receive no supplemental services at all. In large part this is because almost all schools are caught in a financial squeeze. Local revenues are insufficient, Federal funds are virtually nonexistent and only little State aid is available—for example only $100,000 is available from the State of New Jersey for gifted and talented programs, less than $2 per identified student.

Since local schools don't have the financial resources to provide fully adequate services for these children, I propose that we reverse directions: the talented and gifted need more attention, not less. And to this end, today I am introducing a bill to reestablish a Federal program to aid the gifted and talented. We must have a focused effort to see that our best and our brightest do succeed. We need to pull this program out of the education block grant and get it funded at least at minimally adequate levels. My bill includes an authorization for appropriations of $50 million for each of the next 4 fiscal years—almost 10 times the maximum funding level achieved in the late 1970's.

The bill includes two key provisions to help target funds to needy schools. First, the bulk of the funding will be in the form of grants to States for distribution of funds to local schools on a competitive basis. If schools have a new idea worth trying out, they can apply for Federal aid through the State departments of education. Second, half of the funds will be targeted to gifted children from disadvantaged and low-income backgrounds to ensure that the gifted children from inner city schools will not be left behind.

My bill would also require the Secretary of Education to reestablish the Office of Gifted and Talented in the U.S. Office of Elementary and Secondary Education to ensure that information and research on the talented and gifted is collected and share with local school districts.

Many school districts around the country have established excellent programs for the gifted. We need to support these programs nationally. In New Jersey, the efforts underway in Montclair, Bayonne, Elizabeth, Union City, and other places need to be encouraged—not only with our best wishes, but also with our financial support. And that is why I am proposing this new legislation.

Mr. President, Federal aid can help solve problems. For example, the convocation model project set up in New Jersey to provide advanced science for the gifted was funded in 1979 through the old Federal talented and gifted legislation. Over 3,000 New Jersey students and 500 New Jersey teachers benefited from the project. Unfortunately, that program died in 1981 when funding was cut off. We need to encourage efforts such as these, not discourage them.

Mr. President, in order to move from the rhetoric of educational reform to true reform, we must come to grips with the fact that children vary considerably in their abilities. It is our task to see that each and every student, including the gifted, receive a challenging education, an education designed to allow that child to reach his or her potential. We cannot rob the students who are struggling to learn basic skills, but neither can we continue to ignore our gifted children who quickly become bored and nonlearners because of a lack of challenge. We need to increase standards for all of our students. In sum, we need—at the Federal, State, and local level—to make a commitment to all of our students, whether they be disadvantaged, gifted or in-between. We need—through chapter 1 compensatory education programs—to help the disadvantaged student achieve his or her potential; but we also need—through Federal aid to talented and gifted programs—to help the gifted and talented student achieve his or her potential.

Gifted and talented children represent an invaluable national resource, one that remains sadly underdeveloped. I truly believe that our leadership position in the world depends on our commitment to our youth. Our goal must be to do everything in our power to help all students reach their potential level of intellectual development. Special attention to gifted and talented students is called for if our Nation is to maintain and improve its position as a world leader in technology, the sciences, the humanities, and the arts. This legislation is a small step in the right direction to achieve this end.●

S. 453. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to safeguard taxpayer's rights; to the Committee on Finance.

TAXPAYER'S PROCEDURAL SAFEGUARD ACT

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a measure to set forth new requirements for levy and seizure of property and other taxpayer protections. This legislation was the centerpiece for the hearings of my Subcommittee on Oversight of the Internal Revenue Service in March 1984.

In my view, it is important to examine specific segments of IRS procedures to be certain they are both effective and fair to taxpayers. While very few taxpayers are subject to the levy and seizure provisions, they are among the most sweeping powers available to a Federal agency. We have the responsibility to be certain that they are exercised with restraint and that citizens are certain of their rights.

My bill lengthens the period during which a taxpayer must pay a deficiency after notice and demand by the service from 10 to 30 days. A more detailed explanation of a taxpayer's remedies on receipt of notice and demand is also required of my bill. This bill also increases the amount of a taxpayer's wages and salary that is exempt from levy, and it prohibits the IRS from levying if the cost of selling the asset exceeds the asset's fair market value or the liability the Service is attempting to satisfy. New procedures are outlined for the release of a levy and I have inserted the restrictions on unwarranted subsequent levies.

This legislation also provides for review of jeopardy levies and assessments. Taxpayers have frequently complained of the Service's abrogation of installment sales agreements. Barring any dramatic increase in a taxpayer's economic fortunes, this bill provides better protection for taxpayers who have installment agreements with the IRS.

If the IRS provides a taxpayer with inaccurate written advice, my bill abates the portion of the deficiency which is based on incorrect information. The bill also requires the IRS to advise taxpayers that oral advice from the Service is not binding on them in subsequent litigation.

This legislation also contains new rules for the conduct of taxpayer interviews, so a citizen knows what to expect when questioned by the IRS. Also, it stresses the importance of arranging an interview at a location convenient to the taxpayer.

Also, this legislation requires the ombudsman to be a Presidential appointee, outlines his or her specific duties, and gives the ombudsman certain taxpayer relief powers in specific situations.

Finally, my bill enables the taxpayer to appeal an administrative lien and it provides a taxpayer with a cause of action against the Service for wrongful lien or levy.

To assemble the provisions of this bill, I have worked with taxpayers and taxpayer advocate groups throughout the Nation. This legislation has been endorsed by the National Taxpayers Union, Citizens Choice, and the National Taxpayers Legal Defense Fund. Many of these provisions will need further refinement and some may be rejected as unnecessary or ineffective in achieving their purpose. It is my hope that this legislation will address valid taxpayer concerns and promote better understanding and relations between the IRS and taxpayers.●

S. 454. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a 20 per centum investment tax credit for certain soil or water conservation expenditures; to the Committee on Finance.

INVESTMENT CREDIT FOR CERTAIN SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION EXPENDITURES

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a soil and water conservation tax credit measure with my colleagues, Senators SYMMS, BOREN, and DURENBERGER. The purpose of this legislation is to increase incentives for taxpayers to improve their soil and water conservation practices.

It is commonplace for Members of Congress who represent farm States or arid States to make speeches decrying the Federal Government's current conservation effort. The rate of soil erosion and the impact of soil erosion on the future productivity of our land are serious issues for our Nation. Some analysts have questioned whether the lack of Federal and State attention to this growing problem will jeopardize our efforts to produce an adequate supply of food to meet future domestic and world needs. The increasing depletion of soil is alarming because it shows a disregard for an important natural resource and indicates poor management of our Nation's farmland.

The Council for Agricultural Science and Technology (CAST), in a 1982 report, concluded that soil erosion was most serious in 12 north central States. In the Corn Belt, losses of 10 tons per acre or more were common on 19 percent of the row cropped land; on some parcels, the soil loss exceeded 40 tons per acre annually. Unfortunately, soil loss is not limited to these 12 States. In the southeastern States, erosion rates of more than 11 tons per acre occurred on 32 percent of the land used for row crops. The highest soil erosion rates in the Nation are on the 26,000 square miles of the upper Mississippi Valley which includes the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. Mountain States are plagued by wind erosion of their soil. The average annual wind erosion rate on cropland is 9 tons per acre in Colorado, 11 tons per acre in New Mexico, and 15 tons per acre in Texas. On the Columbia plateau in the Pacific Northwest, average long-term erosion rates of 15 to 25 tons per acre are common with occasional erosion rates as high as 50 to 100 tons per acre.

Farmers' dramatic increase in crop yields have masked the damaging effects of soil and water erosion. In the CAST report, one scientist noted that studies with corn have shown a yield reduction of 1 to 9 bushels per acre for each inch of topsoil loss. These losses are offset by planting better crop varieties, increasing the use of fertilizer, and improving pest control. It is not prudent for us to gamble that improved technology in the future will enable us to offset the damage we are currently inflicting. In our present economic climate, many farmers feel it is necessary to deplete their soil to stay in business.

My bill permits farmers to claim a 20-percent credit for installing certain approved soil and water conservation practices. This list was recommended by the Soil Conservation Service, and is specific enough to eliminate the possibility of any taxpayer claiming a creditable expense for building swimming pools or planting trees in their front yards. To be certain the expenditure meets the standards imposed by the Soil Conservation Service, this bill requires certification by SCS. This certification requirement relieves the IRS of the responsibility of assessing whether or not a conservation technology is properly employed.

While this provision does not repeal current law, it limits the total amount of tax benefit from soil and water conservation measures a taxpayer may claim to 25 percent of a taxpayer's gross income from farming. This cap is designed to discourage investors from claiming the credit who do not derive any gross income from farming. The 20 percent credit will apply to eligible improvements to land. If the 20 percent credit is elected, a taxpayer would be limited to straight line depreciation. For the acquisition of eligible depreciable property, the taxpayer would be limited to the 10 percent investment tax credit and a 10 percent add-on credit for a total credit of 20 percent. The remaining depreciation is deducted by using the straight line method. The regular recapture and carryover rules will apply to this credit.

We selected the credit approach because it is easier to administer and more easily understood by taxpayers. In my discussions with farmers and agriculture experts, they overwhelmingly favored this approach as opposed to more complicated schemes.

This bill is narrowly drafted to stimulate soil and water conservation without stimulating tax shelter activity. It addresses a serious problem which we can no longer afford to ignore. I hope my colleagues will join me in this important effort.●

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 455. A bill to permit a married individual filing a joint return to deduct certain payments made to an individual retirement plan established for the benefit of a working spouse; to the Committee on Finance.

SPECIAL RULES FOR CERTAIN MARRIED INDIVIDUALS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a measure designed to enable nonworking spouses to enjoy full individual retirement account benefits. Under current law, individuals receiving compensation are permitted to exclude 100 percent of compensation up to $2,000 from their income if such an amount is deposited in an IRA—Individual Retirement Account. A married nonworking individual may participate in a spousal IRA if the working spouse elects to contribute an amount for both spouses. The maximum amount which may be contributed to a spousal IRA is $2,250—up to 100 percent of compensation. A nonworking spouse halves the benefits from this IRA, but is not permitted to perpetuate the IRA if he or she is divorced or widowed and is not receiving compensation.

The retirement crisis is a pressing concern of the 99th Congress. As a larger percentage of the population joins the ranks of the aging, new retirement solutions will be needed. In my view, it is imperative that we enact tax incentives to encourage people to plan for their retirement. All Americans need to develop personal retirement alternatives to prevent exclusive reliance on Social Security benefits.

My legislation will permit a working spouse to set aside a full $2,000 contribution for a nonworking spouse in a spousal IRA. This will permit improved retirement planning for much of our population as well as acknowledge the contributions of homemakers and house-husbands in furthering the family as an economic unit. These uncompensated individuals make critical contributions to the family enterprise. In may home State of Iowa, farm wives are an integral part of the success of a family operation. The Internal Revenue Code should recognize this contribution and permit individuals to participate in these tax deferred retirement plans.

All savings incentives have the beneficial effect of increasing capital formation. A greater poll of national savings increases the supply of money for capital investments. This legislation increases the class of individuals eligible for an IRA account. Greater IRA contributions boost total long-term savings and create additional capital for economic growth. To conclude, this legislation is important because it provides retirement security for nonworking spouses and acknowledge their important contribution to the family unit. It encourages more Americans to actively plan for their retirement years. Finally, it encourages capital formation.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 456. A bill providing for a 5-year extension of two patents relating to cardiac drugs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF TWO PATENTS RELATING TO CARDIAC DRUGS

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I'm introducing a bill to extend the patents on two life-saving drugs. These drugs have been developed by the University of Minnesota and have the potential to save the lives of thousands and thousands of people who suffer from heart problems that often result in sudden death.

It is very important to the University of Minnesota and the general public that we extend the patents so that clinical studies can be conducted to compare these drugs with other drugs that are currently being used. If the studies are not conducted, it is certain that the drugs will not be widely used, if used at all, when the patents expire.

Because the first patent expires in April 1986, the timing of the process makes it appropriate for me to recount the circumstances demonstrating the need for the patent extensions. As my colleagues on the Judiciary Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights and Trademarks are well aware, obtaining drug approval from the Food and Drug Administration is often a lengthy procedure. I'm not suggesting that the FDA acted inappropriately or in an untimely manner in approving the use of the drugs. Indeed, I do not know the circumstances leading to the FDA's approval. However, the fact still remains that the FDA did not approve the drugs for general use until 1981. And, physicians have not been using these life-saving drugs because the studies I referred to earlier have not yet been done.

Since FDA's approval in 1981, efforts have been made to have the studies conducted by private industry. But, because of the short remaining life of the patents, it has become economically impracticable for private industry to finance the studies and overcome this obstacle. The University of Minnesota has pledged to finance the studies if the patents are extended.

I believe it is clearly in the public interest to extend the patents, and to do so at the earliest possible time. Although the first patent does not expire until 1986, and the second in early 1987, it is necessary to extend the patents now, because the studies themselves may take up to 2 years.

I had originally intended to offer this legislation last year as an amendment to H.R. 6286. However, the fact that no hearings had been held to evaluate the merits of extending the patents prompted me to withdraw my amendment. Although I would have preferred to accomplish this goal last year, I have been assured by my colleague from Maryland, Senator MATHIAS, that his subcommittee will hold hearings early this year on the need for additional patent protection for these two drugs.

To accomplish our goal, I am looking forward to working closely with the Senator from Maryland on this matter and will appreciate his assistance in scheduling hearings and committee and floor action at the earliest possible time. I plan to coordinate my efforts with Congressman SABO who has been very helpful. In addition, I am confident that the other Members of the Minnesota delegation in the House will join our efforts in achieving enactment of this important patent extension legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 456

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Commerce, acting through the Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks, shall—

(1) when patent numbered 3441649 (for the cardiac drug Bretylium Tosylate) expires; and

(2) when patent numbered 3495013 (for the cardiac drug Bethanidine Sulphate) expires; extend such patent for five years, with all the rights pertaining thereto.●

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. LEAHY):

S.J. Res. 47. Joint resolution designating the week beginning November 10, 1985, as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL WOMEN VETERANS RECOGNITION WEEK

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am delighted today to be introducing Senate Joint Resolution 47, a measure to designate the week beginning November 10, 1985, as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week." I am introducing this measure on behalf of myself and Senator MURKOWSKI, the acting chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, the past chairman, Senator SIMPSON, as well as Senators DECONCINI and SPECTER, members of our committee and the Judiciary Committee, to which the resolution will be referred, and Senator LEAHY, also a member of the Judiciary Committee, as is Senator SIMPSON. This measure is very similar to a measure I authored in the last Congress, Senate Joint Resolution 227, which was enacted into law as Public Law 98-438. Pursuant to that law, the week of November 11 of last year was designated as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week."

Mr. President, last year's effort made a very good start in creating greater public awareness and recognition of the contributions of women veterans; many activities were carried out across the Nation honoring women veterans. We are proposing the designation of such a week again this year as a reflection of our view that much remains to be done to make the public more aware of the many contributions of women veterans over the years so as to gain for them the recognition they so richly deserve and to make the women veterans themselves aware of the many benefits available to them because of their service.

Mr. President, with reference to this second goal—of making women veterans themselves more aware of the benefits that relate to their status as veterans—it has become clear, beginning with a 1982 General Accounting Office report, then through the work of the VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans, and, most recently, through a September 1984 VA report, that far too many women veterans are not aware of the implications of their status as veterans. For example, the recent VA report, entitled "Data on Female Veterans, Fiscal Year 1983," found that, although women veterans represent 4.1 percent of the overall veteran population, they accounted for only 2.1 percent of the population in VA medical centers on census day in June 1983 and for only 1.8 percent of the total VA hospital discharges in fiscal year 1983.

The VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans was first established administratively on a temporary basis but later, in November 1983, given statutory permanance by virtue of the enactment of legislation I first proposed. In its first report, issued in July 1984, the Advisory Committee made the following points:

Two fundamental problems cut across the issues discussed by the Committee. First: Many women veterans are not aware of their entitlement to the benefits administered by the VA and other women who may be aware of their entitlements are reluctant to initiate claims for their benefits. Second: VA information materials, brochures, and outreach programs designed to inform veterans of their rights and benefits have been aimed at a male constituency. In part, this is merely a reflection of a traditional societal mindset that a veteran is, almost by definition, male.

I concur fully with these concerns of the Advisory Committee and believe that the measure we are introducing today is one concrete response to those concerns. In this regard, I note that VA Administrator Harry Walters, in a November 6, 1984, letter to me in response to my request for the VA's views on the Advisory Committee's report, indicated that the VA was taking various steps to address these concerns of the Advisory Committee.

So that my colleagues and others with an interest in the work of the Advisory Committee may have a better appreciation of its work and the VA's response to it, I ask unanimous consent that the Advisory Committee's July 1984 report, which includes as appendix A a list of the members of the Committee, my September 14, 1984, letter to Administrator Walters requesting the agency's views on the recommendations in that report, and this November 6, 1984, reply be reprinted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, as I did last year, I look forward to working with my good friends, the Chairman [Mr. THURMOND] and ranking minority member [Mr. BIDEN] of the Judiciary Committee, as well as my other colleagues on that committee, as they consider this measure. The sponsors of the resolution invite all our colleagues to join with us and help ensure its quick enactment so as to allow sufficient time for the advance publicity that can bring about maximum awareness among the public about National Women Veterans Recognition Week.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON WOMEN VETERANS

INTRODUCTION

This is the first report of the Veterans' Administration Advisory Committee on Women Veterans. The Committee was originally established by the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, Mr. Harry N. Walters, in April 1983, as an internal advisory group. His decision was in response to growing concerns within the Congress, the Agency, and veterans' groups that women were not receiving equal access to programs and benefits to which they were entitled as veterans.

The first meeting was held September 14-16, 1983. In November 1983, PL 98-160 mandated a committee. Since all the members of the Administrator's Committee satisfied the legal requirements of the Congressional mandate, the membership remained the same. Subsequent meetings were held February 14-16, 1984 and May 14-15, 1984. All meetings were open to the public.

Each member of the Committee is either a veteran, a current member of the armed forces, and/or actively involved in veterans activities. Each, therefore, brings first-hand knowlege of many of the issues discussed in this report. In addition to participating in the regular meetings, individual members have visted, on their own and at their expense, VA field activities in order to acquaint themselves with current operations and problem areas. It is worth noting that, during these visits, it was obvious that significant progress had been made over the past two years in raising the level of awareness of officials at all levels to the need for providing better care for women veterans. In many cases actions were already under way to correct deficiencies where it could be done within existing policies, facilities, and funds. The emphasis was coming directly from the top—the Administrator or his immediate staff.

The Committee wishes to acknowledge and express appreciation to Mr. Harry Walters for his unstinting support of women veterans and the work of this Committee.

We thank Nora Kinzer, Ph.D., Special Assistant to the Administrator, for her wise counsel and her considerable assistance throughout our deliberations. We would also like to thank Susan Mather, M.D., Chief, Pulmonary and Infectious Diseases, Department of Medicine and Surgery; Mrs. Mary Leyland, Deputy Director, Education Service, Department of Veterans Benefits; Ms. Nan Nave, Staff Assistant, Department of Memorial Affairs, and Mrs. Barbara Brandau, Program Assistant, Office of the Administrator, for their cooperation and assistance. We commend the excellent briefings provided by the Veterans Administration and particularly commend the special efforts of Mr. Robert Schultz, Director, Office of Information Management and Statistics, and his staff.

The Committee wants to acknowledge the presence and interest of the Disabled American Veterans, American Veterans of WWII, Korea and Vietnam, Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Paralyzed Veterans of America, Vietnam Veterans of America, American Nurses' Association, and Women's Equity Action League.

BACKGROUND

As of March 1984 there were an estimated 1,158,900 women veterans comprising 4.1 percent of the total veteran population. Their numbers and proportion to the total have increased significantly during the past decade as a direct reflection of the rapid expansion in the numbers of women entering the all-volunteer Forces. Women currently constitute nearly 10 percent of the armed forces today as compared to roughly one percent at the beginning of the 1970's and this trend is projected to continue, albeit at a slower pace, for the next several years. As these growing numbers of women leave the military ranks their presence will impact proportionally on the veteran population in a variety of ways.

By law men and women have equal rights as veterans to the benefits and services administered by the Veterans Administration (VA). However, evidence has mounted over the years that this has often not been the case in practice—that, for a variety of reasons, women veterans were being shortchanged. This was cited in September 1982 by the General Accounting Office. After an investigation of VA activities, the GAO reported that, although progress had been made in insuring that medical care and other benefits were available to women veterans, the VA had not adequately focused on their needs. The report specifically pointed out the need for action to insure that:

Men and women have equal access to VA treatment programs and medical facilities; women treated in VA facilities receive complete physical examinations; needed gynecological care is provided; sufficient plans are made for the anticipated increase in female veterans, and female veterans are adequately informed of their benefits.

It is the objective of this Committee, and, we believe, of the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, as well as the Congress, to insure that all veterans, regardless of gender, receive the benefits to which each is entitled under the laws and policies administered by the Veterans Administration. This has been, and remains, the guiding principle of the Committee, and it is within this context that we have addressed the issues.

ISSUES AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Outreach

Two fundamental problems cut across the issues discussed by the Committee. First: Many women veterans are not aware of their entitlement to the benefits administered by the VA and other women who may be aware of their entitlements are reluctant to initiate claims for their benefits. Second: VA information materials, brochures, and outreach programs designed to inform veterans of their rights and benefits have been aimed at a male constituency. In part, this is merely a reflection of a traditional societal mindset that a veteran is almost by definition male.

The VA has recently become aware of these problems of communication and recognizes that it has a responsibility to reach out to women veterans informing them of their rights and encouraging them to take advantage of benefits provided by the VA to all veterans. Notable progress has already been made. One noteworthy initiative is a display board depicting women veterans to be used at conventions and meetings.

The VA's Office of Public and Consumer Affairs has prepared an outreach action plan that includes a women-oriented publication, a poster, a public service announcements and other activities designed to inform women veterans of their entitlements and to encourage them to use their VA benefits. Women Veterans, VA employees, veterans service organizations, the news, and specialized media have been targeted.

Recommendations

The VA continue an aggressive outreach program for all women veterans with a coordinated and integrated public information campaign utilizing the various media.

The VA revise the cover of the current brochure on Federal Benefits for Veterans and Dependents to depict both service man and women and develop a separate pamphlet or flyer on women veterans with the contents prepared with the advice and assistance of the Advisory Committee.

The VA contact the National Advertising Council to pursue public service announcements on women veterans.

The VA continue issuing press releases on women veterans.

A film or video tape be developed that would highlight women veterans' issues, to be made available to veterans and all other community groups. The film should be made with consultation and advice of the members of the Advisory Committee.

The term "women veterans" be used instead of "female veterans" in VA communications except when "female" is clearly preferable.

The VA adopt the slogan "WOMEN ARE VETERANS TOO" for use in their outreach campaign.

The VA Advisory Committee members be used as a resource to the VA for outreach.

Health care facilities and staffing

One of the most important benefits of veterans is health care provided by VA medical centers. Historically, medical facilities and services have been designed primarily to meet the needs of the large male veteran population while the needs of the women veterans have received little or no attention.

Since 1981, a concerted effort has been made to accommodate women patients. Within the VA medical system there are 172 hospitals, 103 nursing home care units, and 227 outpatient clinics serving veterans. All of the hospitals, outpatient clinics and nursing homes now serve women; however, the level varies from minimal to the full range of services, depending on the physical plant and staffing at individual facilities.

The medical system also includes 16 domiciliaries. Only nine currently have the facilities and staffing to accept women.

Although much has been accomplished to meet the needs of women veterans, clearly much still remains to be done before women can be fully integrated into the VA health care system.

To provide comprehensive care for both male and female veterans, facilities such as adequate bathrooms, bedrooms and examination areas are necessary to meet acceptable privacy standards. Furthermore, appropriate diagnostic and treatment facilities are required to provide inpatient and outpatient care, including gynecology.

To date, 22 centers have submitted proposals for changes in their 5-year plans to meet these needs. Also, centers have asked for funds of less than $50,000 at the district level to begin immediate renovations.

Construction and renovation to meet those needs require high priority. However, changes of less than $50,000 allocated at the district or hospital level are not always assigned a priority that will guarantee funding. For example, a medical center requesting only $18,000 for installation of private shower stalls was denied those funds because the district did not give it a high enough priority.

In order to keep faith with women veterans, changes identified in 5-year plans must be accomplished within the next five years and not relegated to subsequent 5-year plans. We urge the Administrator to establish a requirement for annual progress reports on construction and renovation projects for privacy.

Inadequate staffing has been given as a reason for not integrating women into the health care system. Consequently, budgetary considerations must include adequate staffing of all health care facilities. For example, nurse practitioners trained/certified in gynecologic care could provide some gynecological services as well as health counselling where those services are not available.

Recommendations

Construction and renovation projects regarding privacy be given first priority and not relegated to subsequent 5-year plans.

Privacy renovations costing less than $50,000, where approval authority rests at district or medical center level, be assigned a priority that will guarantee funding.

The Administrator establish a requirement for annual progress reports on construction and renovation for privacy.

Budgetary considerations include adequate staffing of all medical facilities to fully integrate women into the health care system.

Nurse practitioners certified in gynecological care be used to provide some gynecological services as well as health counselling where those services are not currently available.

Women Veteran Coordinators

Some women veterans have not used the VA medical care system in the past because of inadequate information or a perception of being unwelcome in a male-oriented facility. Some women have also complained about an unsympathetic attitude toward women projected by the staff. In general, women veterans have not had an effective method through which to channel their concerns.

To address this problem, in July 1983, Medical District 12 (Florida), with ten health care facilities, launched a new program by appointing women coordinators. The VA, by a Chief Medical Director's Letter in December 1983, recommended that a coordinator program be considered by all VA health care facilities. Medical facilities in other states have successfully initiated programs but programs have not been established systemwide. Where these programs exist, they have been well received by women veterans and local VA staff. The programs would be more effective if the VA established uniform guidelines and a method to exchange information among coordinators.

District 12 could provide the model for uniform guidelines. The model should include a description of the duties and responsibilities of the position. Actions which might be included are:

Publicizing the coordinator's name and responsibilities to all VA staff, personnel and patients,

Establishing direct reporting procedures from the coordinator to the director,

Scheduling period meetings/conference calls within a district.

Ideally the coordinator should be a woman sensitive to needs of women veterans. Her position should allow coordination with the director and chiefs of services to correct problems or effect needed policy or procedural changes.

Another mechanism to improve the health care delivery to women veterans is the appointment of a local in-house Advisory Group on Women Veterans. Groups already formed have begun to address such subjects as gynecological care, privacy, security and sensitivity training of VA staff at the local facilities.

Establishing coordinators in all VA health care facilities and encouraging the use of women's advisory groups would demonstrate the Veterans Administration's commitment to women veterans.

Recommendations

The VA establish a policy that each medical facility appoint a women veteran coordinator.

The VA publish uniform guidelines for the women veteran coordinator position.

The VA encourage the use of local women's advisory groups.

Statistics

It is significant that the acutal size, composition, and trends of the women veterans' population have been determined only recently. Despite the fact that women have served in the U.S. armed forces continuously since the turn of the century, and that 350,000 served during World War II, the entrance of these women into the veterans' ranks went largely unnoticed. Without adequate information, the needs of women veterans could not be adequately addressed and existing programs and services could not be evaluated.

It was not until after the proportions of women in the All Volunteer Force had jumped from 1 percent to 8.5 percent that the first serious attempt was made to accurately assess the female segment of the veteran population.

The 1980 Census was the first time that data were systematically obtained on women veterans. It was then discovered that the number of women veterans was far larger than previously estimated. Also, it was learned that there are significant differences between male and female veteran populations that could impact on VA programs. For example: While the median ages for the two groups are roughly the same, the proportions of older veterans differ. Whereas just under 29 percent of the male veterans are 60 years of age or older, nearly 38 percent of the female veterans are in this age category.

Using the new data provided by the 1980 Census, the VA has been able to conduct the first comprehensive analysis of the national population of living women veterans. A summary of the findings have been published in the monograph: The Female Veteran Population, (RMS 70-84-1) November 1983, a copy of which is attached.

Other data collected in recent years by the VA show that compared to men, women veterans have applied for fewer benefits due them, such as medical care, hospitalization and educational benefits under the G.I. Bill.

To better understand the reasons why many women veterans do not use their benefits, the Veterans Administration has awarded a contract to Louis Harris and Associates, Inc., to conduct a survey of women veterans. The survey, to be completed by February 1985, will consist of a random sample of personal interviews of 3,000 women veterans nationwide. It will provide in-depth information on socioeconomic characteristics, health status, and use of VA programs and facilities. This will aid the VA in making policy decisions on services provided by the Veterans Administration and in designing future programs and facilities.

The VA has recently mandated that all future studies of veterans conducted or contracted for by the VA will include women veterans. However, in studies based on sampling techniques, there is still the danger that, due to their relatively small numbers (4.1 percent of total veterans) the female population would be inadequately represented. This could lead to skewed results.

Recommendations

All major statistical reports compiled and published by the VA on veterans include separate break outs on women veterans.

The VA review and revise their programs based on the newly available data on women veterans.

All future studies of veterans include a subsample of women veterans analyzed separately.

Agent orange

According to the Special Assistant for Environmental Sciences, all U.S. personnel who served in South Vietnam are presumed to have been exposed directly, or indirectly, to Agent Orange. At this time, there is a difference of opinion in the scientific community as to the effects of dioxin exposure. The subject has been under intensive study worldwide with no definitive conclusion to date. This uncertainty serves to heighten all Vietnam veterans' fears.

The approximately 7,000 women Vietnam veterans are not included in Agent Orange Studies conducted by the Veterans Administration, Centers for Disease Control and other agencies. Admittedly, compared to the number of men who served there, the number of women is proportionately small. But their small number does not justify their total exclusion from ongoing studies designed to determine the effects of exposure. Each veteran deserves the same level of public concern.

A separate corollary study of women and Agent Orange is clearly indicated and needs to be done without further delay.

The concerns of the female Vietnam veterans are genuine, and, in most respects, mirror those of the men. Like the men, many of these women fear that various health problems affecting them and their families may be connected with dioxin, the toxic by-product of Agent Orange—problems such as birth defects in their children, skin cancer, leukemia, liver disease and loss of memory. Additionally, the women are concerned that serious female reproductive system problems, such as: ovarian cancer, uterine cancer, miscarriages and spontaneous abortion, may also be related to dioxin exposure.

An additional problem stems from the fact that many women who served in South Vietnam are not aware of the determination that all who served there are presumed to have been exposed to Agent Orange. A special effort needs to be made to reach out to these women and encourage them to report for Agent Orange physicals.

Recommendations

A separate study be conducted on the health of women who served in South Vietnam and were exposed to Agent Orange and other chemicals.

All women Vietnam veterans be contacted and urged to participate in the Agent Orange Registry, if they have not already done so.

Planning for diseases specifically or more commonly found in women

The prevention of illness is more cost effective than treatment of chronic disease. An example of preventive strategy is counselling on hormone replacement, diet and exercise to prevent osteoporosis. Another is education on the hazards of smoking associated with hypertension, heart disease and cancer. It is worth noting that the incidence of lung cancer now surpasses breast cancer as the leading cause of cancer death in women.

Another aspect of prevention is early diagnosis. For women, breast and pelvic examinations and papanicolaou (PAP) smears as part of the routine physical examination are acceptable medical practice. Since 1981, the VA Department of Medicine and Surgery (DM&S) directives have stipulated that these diagnostic procedures be instituted during routine physical examinations of women veterans. In September 1982, the GAO Report, "Actions Needed To Insure That Female Veterans Have Equal Access To VA Benefits," cited VA non-compliance with their own directives. Committee members continue to receive complaints from women veterans that these examinations are not routinely done. Continued emphasis is needed by DM&S on the importance of complete physical examinations of women veterans.

Current studies show that low radiation mammography is efficacious in discovering very small breast tumors, particularly in women over 50. This procedure may detect disease in a curable form and thus shorten subsequent hospitalization. DM&S should assess the best methods for providing this service to women veterans, as mammography becomes the standard of practice.

In the past, gynecological care has been minimal. Future planning should recognize that an increasing number of women veterans will be seeking treatment for medical problems in the aging population, such as postmenopausal symptoms, endometrial cancer, ovarian hormone replacement, osteoporosis, and bone fractures.

One of the problems in planning for future health care is the lack of female outpatient population data. Currently these data are not being collected. Medical facilities should be required to collect outpatient visit data by gender.

Once the female outpatient data are known, more innovative and effective use of health care personnel can be organized. For example, GYN nurse practitioners trained in gynecological procedures can provide a large share of counselling, diagnosis and treatment for gynecological problems.

The Deputy Assistant Chief Medical Director for Nursing Programs, in her presentation to the Committee, discussed strides made by VA District #10 Nursing Services in identifying the changes needed to care for women patients in their six facilities. These changes included a list of needed supplies and equipment. Such a list would be helpful to other health facilities.

In areas where the size of the female population is small it is impractical to stock pharmaceuticals for common gynecological diseases. Therefore, the facility should establish procedures for timely local purchases.

There is an additional problem concerning health care for women. Policies concerning disability compensation require review, especially in the area of diseases that primarily affect women. Systemic Lupus Erythematosis (SLE), for example, is primarily a disease of women. In June 1983, Alfred D. Steinburg, M.D. of the National Institute of Arthritis, Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Disease, reported that between the ages of 12 and 45 years, approximately 90 percent of the patients diagnosed to have SLE were females.

H.R. 5688, which has passed the House of Representatives, would add Systemic Lupus Erythematosis to the list of chronic diseases in Section 301 of Title 38 United States Code. The committee supports passage of this or similar legislation.

Recommendations

The VA continue to emphasize that breast and pelvic examinations and pap smears will be routinely accomplished as part of a woman's physical examination.

The VA assess the best methods for providing low radiation mammography to the woman veteran.

The VA include treatment for gynecological care in the aging population (e.g., postmenopausal symptoms, endometrial cancer, ovarian hormone replacement) in future planning.

The VA provide counselling on the prevention of osteoporosis.

The VA provide counselling to the patients and staff on the hazards of smoking.

The VA record outpatient visits by gender.

The VA disseminate to medical facilities a list of supplies and equipment needed to care for women patients.

The facility director establish procedures for timely local purchases in areas where the size of the female population precludes stocking pharmaceuticals for common gynecological disease.

Enact legislation adding Systemic Lupus Erythematosis to section 301 of the 38 United States Code.

The Veterans Canteen Service (VCS)

The Veterans Canteen Service is a non-appropriated fund activity created to meet the needs of veterans in VA hospitals, nursing homes and domiciliaries. It operates retail stores, snack bars, cafeterias, barber shops, beauty shops, laundry, tailor, vending machines, newspaper and/or magazine service, ward cart service and other services. Not all of these services are available at each medical center; rather, services are tailored to the needs of each facility. All medical facilities have cafeterias, retail stores and some vending. The objective is to make available to patients, at reasonable prices, articles of merchandise and services essential to their comfort and well-being.

In recent years, a concerted effort has been made to meet the specific needs of the growing population of women patients. However, complaints of women patients and observations of individual committee members during visits to VA medical facilities revealed serious deficiencies in the availability of the merchandise and the services provided to women patients. Some of tuate range of sizes.

Lack or insufficient variety of toiletries and sundries such as sewing supplies, shower caps, manicure supplies, change purses, and slippers.

Lack of pockets in women's slacks and robes.

The VA has recognized the problems noted by the Committee in the Canteen Services and has recently taken aggressive action to resolve them. Advisory Committee members have observed considerable improvement in some of the VA hospitals in recent months.

Recommendations

Each Veterans Canteen Service Chief be required to survey women patients to determine their needs and to evaluate whether they are being met.

The VA review population standards for stocking items essential to women patients.

The VA design a catalogue system for patients to order articles not readily available with a delivery date of no more than two weeks.

Each facility be required to stock toiletries designed expressly for minority women.

The VA continue to aggressively monitor the Canteen Services provided women veterans.

WAAC and WASP service

During World War II, between 15,000 and 16,000 women serving in the WAAC (Women's Army Auxiliary Corps) did not subsequently enroll in the WAC (Women's Army Corps). Another 900 served as members of the WASP's (Woman Airforce Service Pilots). Since service in the WAAC and WASP was not recognized as military active duty, these women were not granted veteran status after the war. The WASP's were recognized as veterans in 1977, and the WAAC's in 1980. Many of these newly recognized veterans have indicated that in general they are unsure of their entitlements under the law. Some report that the Veterans Administration field offices seem to be unaware of their VA entitlements and/or unresponsive to their inquiries.

The Committee finds that the Veterans Administration is aware of the problem of getting the word out to these newly recognized veterans. Upon the enactment of the 1977 law, the Department of Veterans Benefits initiated a special letter which was, and continues to be, automatically sent to each former WASP as soon as the Department of Defense notifies the VA that such an individual has been issued a discharge certificate. This letter advises the individual of potential eligibility for VA benefits and encloses a pamphlet providing additional information about those benefits. With the 1980 acknowledgement of WAAC services as "active duty", former members have been sent similar letters upon the issuance of their discharge certificates.

In accordance with directions issued by the Chief Benefits Director, the Veterans Assistance Service has directed its personnel in the 58 Regional Offices to make a special effort to inform female veterans of their VA benefits. Each month these Veterans Service Offices are required to include in their narrative reports to Central Office a statement of their outreach efforts.

It is unclear how effective the VA's outreach efforts to these groups have been. The VA says it has received no reports of problems to date that might be associated with a lack of knowledge in its regional offices concerning the benefit eligibility of WAAC's and WASP's. Misunderstandings, however, do arise between VA offices and individual claimants due to procedural problems or misconceptions concerning potential versus actual entitlement to payments. For example, many former WAAC's and WASP's have filed claims with the VA not knowing that they must have previously obtained their discharge certificates from the Department of Defense. Until their service is verified by the military, the VA has no authority to grant veterans' benefits.

Recommendations

The VA determine how many of the former WAAC and WASP veterans who qualify for entitlements have, in fact, applied for benefits.

The VA continue to publicize WAAC and WASP eligibility; specifically by seeking out and working with service organizations to notify their membership of these entitlements to benefits.

Flame retardant patient clothing

The VA requires the use of flame retardant material for patient clothing. Since the requirement is being implemented as new clothing is purchased, newly stocked smaller sized garments for women are supposed to be bought in flame retardant fabric. It is well-known that currently available flame retardant fabric is irritating to the skin and uncomfortable for prolonged wear.

Recommendation

The VA reexamine its current policy concerning flame retardant clothing and explore the availability of alternative materials that would provide patient comfort and an acceptable level of protection.

Memorial affairs

Many women veterans do not know of their potential entitlement to burial benefits. In the summer of 1983, the VA implemented a campaign to inform funeral directors and veterans service organizations that women veterans are entitled to the same burial benefits as male veterans.

A series of reminder news releases which mention women veterans has been mailed to funeral industry trade publications and other media. The news releases detail the availability of a new, free pamphlet describing the VA program for marking the graves of veterans. In addition to details on eligibility, the brochure includes information on types of monuments available, replacement rules, additional inscriptions, how application is made, monetary allowance in lieu of a government-furnished marker, and shipment and setting of markers. VA offices and veterans service groups have received the pamphlet for distribution to the public. A planned release on eligibility for all VA burial benefits will carry a reminder on women veterans.

Until 1981, all war veterans were eligible for a $300 burial allowance. Under the law enacted in 1981, only veterans who are receiving disability compensation or pension are entitled to the allowance. The Committee notes that the change in the law may have had a disproportionate impact on women veterans because proportionately fewer women veterans have applied for and been granted disability benefits.

Recommendation

The VA continue its special efforts to inform women veterans of their burial benefits, individually and through veterans organizations, and continue to emphasize to funeral directors that a deceased woman may be a veteran with the same entitlements as a male veteran.

FUTURE COMMITTEE ACTIONS

The issues discussed in this report are only some of those identified for action and further monitoring. Others will be explored during future meetings and in visits by individual members of the Committee to VA activities throughout the country.

Among the topics identified for future investigations are:

Jobs and Training: Training, with subsequent employment, is the bridge which completes the transition for the veteran into the mainstream of civilian life. Second only to the health of a veteran, full-time unsubsidized employment is the foundation of social adjustment and social status. Presently two statutes are in force that are designed to enhance employment and training of veterans. They are the Jobs Training Partnership Act (JTPA) which is administered by the Department of Labor, and the Emergency Veterans Job Training Act, which is a joint venture of the VA and the Department of Labor. It is not known how these two laws impact on women veterans. The Committee believes it would be important to find out how many women are using these benefits and whether there are problems unique to women in the application of these laws. To determine this we will have to review data relating to such topics as women veterans and jobs; the use of the Vocational Rehabilitation Program by women veterans; and statistics on unemployment among women veterans—a whole range of employment information.

Research on Women's Diseases: Research in disease areas which affect mainly women has not been funded equitably in the VA research program in the past. With the increase in the number of women in the Department of Defense and the VA system, the VA has the potential to accomplish significant longitudinal studies on women's health. Continued emphasis is needed to encourage these studies.

CONCLUSION

The Advisory Committee on Women Veterans believes that much has been accomplished in recent years to recognize women as veterans and to reach out to them over the broad range of VA programs and services. Issues have been identified and numerous corrective measures have been initiated on various problems, many on the VA's own initiatives, others at the suggestion of the Committee. The most important action taken by the Administrator has been to sensitize the organization and its personnel at all levels to the presence of women in the veteran population. Although more needs to be done to insure that all personnel are sensitive to the needs and concerns of the women veterans, the positive effects of these efforts are already discernable throughout the organization. Progress can be monitored by requiring VA field inspection team reports to include a statement on the facility's effectiveness in meeting the needs of women veterans. This kind of emphasis from the top will be required on a continuing basis if real, sustained progress is to be achieved over the long haul. To sustain these positive effects, the VA's training and management courses should include awareness and sensitivity training to the needs of women veterans.

We believe that actions taken at the recommendation of this Committee for improving the health care delivery and access to benefits for women veterans will lead to overall improvement in care for all veterans.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, Sept. 14, 1984.

Hon. HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs 810 Vermont Avenue, NW. Washington, DC.

DEAR HARRY: Thank you for sending the Report of the Veterans Administration Advisory Committee on Women Veterans. I agree with you that this Advisory Committee has accomplished much in its first year. I believe that this report provides useful information regarding the VA's ongoing efforts to meet the needs of our Nation's women veterans.

So that I and other members of the Committee might be better able to evaluate the appropriateness, feasibility, and likely impact of the Advisory Committee's recommendations, it would be very helpful if you would, pursuant to section 222(d)(1) of title 38, United States Code, provide any comments you may have regarding the specific recommendations contained in the report.

As always, Harry, I appreciate your cooperation and assistance, and I look forward to receiving your response.

With warm regards.

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, Nov. 6, 1984.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON: This letter is in reply to your September 14, 1984, letter requesting detailed responses to specific recommendations contained in the report from the Veterans Administration Advisory Committee on Women Veterans.

I am proud of the work of this committee and concur in their recommendations. My specific answers to each of the sections contained in the report are found below.

OUTREACH

Since November 11-17, 1984, is Women Veterans Recognition Week, the Veterans Administration is planning celebrations throughout the country. Mr. Donald Jones, Associate Deputy Administrator for Public and Consumer Affairs, and his staff have worked closely with Committee members in preparing a brochure informing women veterans of their benefits. (Copy enclosed).

Also enclosed is a poster prepared by the Veterans Administration's Office of Public and Consumer Affairs. This poster emphasizes contributions of women in the military and has been distributed to VA facilities, veterans service organizations and State governments. The Veterans Administration has planned Public Service Announcements for television distribution emphasizing the contribution of women in the military and urging women veterans to seek information regarding their benefits. Veterans Administration officials make a particular point of reaching out to women veterans in all public appearances and speaking engagements.

HEALTH CARE FACILITIES AND STAFFING

I strongly support the needs for privacy for both male and female patients in the renovation of the Veterans Administration facilities. The former Chief Medical Director and I have constantly emphasized the importance placed on health care for women veterans. Dr. Custis sent many memoranda and directives to the field emphasizing these points.

You understand the needs of balancing priorities between needs for construction, renovation, and budget constraints. I have directed my Associate Deputy Administrator for Logistics to emphasize to the field the necessity for upgrading hospitals, clinics, nursing homes, and domiciliaries regarding privacy for the woman patient.

I am proud of the important role that the nursing staff has taken to ensure continued improvement in the care of women veterans. We shall continue to provide support to the Department of Medicine and Surgery for innovative and creative ways nurses, and nurse practitioners, and all other health care professionals can meet the special needs of women veterans.

WOMEN VETERAN COORDINATORS

Former Chief Medical Director, Dr. Donald Custis, on December 6, 1983, issued a letter emphasizing his strong support for the idea of approving a high ranking woman counselor in hospitals, clinics, domiciliaries, and nursing homes. I have directed my staff to organize a conference of women counselors in order to discuss current successes and guidelines in implementing such a program.

STATISTICS

I concur with the commendations given by the Advisory Committee on Women Veterans to the Office of Information Management and Statistics for its groundbreaking research on women veterans. Given the dearth of knowledge on women veterans, I approved a grant of $789,449.00 for a contract to Louis Harris and Associates to conduct a survey of women veterans.

The Veterans Administration must continue to seek subsamples of women veterans in order to better plan for their special needs. Starting on October 1, 1984, we will gather data on outpatient visits of women veterans.

AGENT ORANGE

I have written to the Centers for Disease Control expressing my support for a study focusing on women who may have been exposed to Agent Orange while serving in the armed forces in Vietnam.

Because the responsibility for the design implementation, analysis and interpretation of the Agent Orange epidemiological study has been transferred to the Centers for Disease Control, they will make the final decision regarding the development of a protocol for such a study.

PLANNING FOR DISEASES SPECIFICALLY AND MORE COMMONLY FOUND IN WOMEN

The former Chief Medical Director, current Acting Chief Medical Director and I heartily support the need for research on gender specific illnesses and the need for insuring high level medical care for those women with gender specific illnesses and diseases. In a recent Department of Medicine and Surgery Conference call it was emphasized that service-connected female veterans could have a mammography performed on a fee basis contract. The Department of Medicine and Surgery is exploring ways to make this diagnostic tool more readily available in the Veterans Administration facilities.

Research and Development within the Department of Medicine and Surgery has sent out requests specifically asking for research proposals dealing with gender related diseases.

Starting on October 1, 1984, all data on outpatient visits will include gender of the patient. As you know, legislation was introduced in the 98th Congress to make Systemic Lupus Erythematosis a chronic disease for purposes of section 301 of title 38, United States Code, thereby entitling certain veterans who have the disease to a presumption of service-connection for purposes of laws administered by the VA. That legislation, however, was not enacted into law.

VETERANS CANTEEN SERVICE (VCS)

I concur with the suggestions given by the Veterans Administration Advisory Committee on Women Veterans regarding the need for improving service to women veterans regarding items sold in the Veterans Administration canteens.

Miss Marjorie Quandt, Assistant Chief Medical Director for Administration, and her staff are working very closely with Canteen Service representatives to ensure that the suggestions of the VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans are implemented. Miss Quandt has informed me that a complete new line of women's clothing (chosen per the VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans recommendations) will be introduced in 100 VA medical center canteens this fall.

WAAC AND WASP SERVICE

I recognize that former members of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps (WAAC's) and Women's Airforce Service Pilots (WASP's) have been unsure of their entitlement to veterans' benefits and that the VA shares in this problem.

Miss Dorothy Starbuck, Chief Benefits Director, has made and continues to make special efforts to alleviate the difficulties experienced by WAAC's and WASP's. Miss Starbuck encourages her staff to work closely with both the WASP and WAC (Women's Army Corps) organizations. I have also requested, a search of our computer files to determine how many former WAAC's and WASP's are receiving veterans benefits. That information will be provided as soon as it is available. Dr. Nora Kinzer, my Special Assistant, and our committee member Major General Jeanne Holm, U.S. Air Force, Retired, have had close contact with the WASP organization. The Chairman of the Committee, Colonel Lorraine Rossi, U.S. Army, Retired, maintains a close liaison with the WAC organization.

FLAME RETARDANT CLOTHING

The Veterans Administration is currently reexamining its policy regarding flame retardant clothing. This issue was originally brought to the attention of the Advisory Committee on Women Veterans but extends to both male and female patients. The Assistant Chief Medical Director for Administration in the Department of Medicine and Surgery is evaluating new flame retardant fabrics and has discontinued use of the previous irritating fabric product.

MEMORIAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Paul Bannai, Director of the Department of Memorial Affairs, instructed his staff to engage in a vigorous outreach program to inform funeral directors that a deceased woman may be a veteran and thereby be entitled to VA burial benefits. During the 1984 Veterans Day Observance at Arlington Cemetery the podium guests will include, for the first time, active duty military women and Colonel Lorraine Rossi, USA Retired, Chairman, Veterans Administration Advisory Committee on Women Veterans representing women veterans.

The Committee's work during the past year and its continued efforts will ensure that the special needs of our nation's female veterans are met and that efforts toward that end will continue to improve within the Veterans Administration.

Sincerely,

HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator.

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. SASSER, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. PELL, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. CHILES, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. BOREN, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. NUNN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. GARN, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S.J. Res. 48. Joint resolution to designate the year of 1986 as the "Year of the Teacher"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

YEAR OF THE TEACHER

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, there are more than 3 million teachers in the United States working at every level of the educational system. These teachers are a critical link in the learning process. Our society relies on its teachers to bring to students, both young and old, the information, knowledge, and skills necessary to develop their talents and to enrich their lives.

The individuals engaged in the teaching profession, taken as a whole, are performing in a dedicated and exemplary manner. Unfortunately, teachers frequently do not receive the recognition, rewards, and respect that their vital role in our society merits.

I am proud to introduce a joint resolution, with the bipartisan support of 31 of my colleagues in the Senate, which would designate 1986 the "Year of the Teacher." This designation, which would be accompanied by the appropriate ceremonies and other activities, is one small way to express the Nation's gratitude to its teachers and to elevate them in the public's esteem.

A largely symbolic act, such as this resolution, certainly does not replace the need to devote adequate resources to education in general and to teachers in particular. Nevertheless, it can be a significant stimulus for improving educational excellence and for recognizing the contributions and needs of our Nation's teachers.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 13—REQUIRING IMPLEMENTATION OF A MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY SYSTEM

Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, and Mr. MELCHER) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

S. CON. RES. 13

Whereas the economic base which sustains the way of life in rural America is under stress from low farm commodity prices, the strong showing of the dollar in international currency markets, declining land values and high interest rates;

Whereas a significant portion of family farmers across the United States are experiencing financial difficulties that threaten not only their economic survival but that of the agricultural related businesses and small towns they support;

Whereas many capable agricultural producers could be returned to financial solvency if they were provided with a debt restructuring program which reduced the effective interest rate on their principal and granted them a longer repayment schedule;

Whereas the price of not taking immediate action to implement such a debt restructuring proposal would be the failure of hundreds of thousands of family farms, agricultural implement suppliers, rural lending institutions and the rendering of the rural fabric of life;

Whereas many of the current problems besetting rural America are by-products of the federal government's inability to control federal spending and keep the federal deficit from inflating the cost of credit and the value of the dollar.

Whereas the President's farm debt restructure initiatives, which were announced in October 1984 and revised in February 1985, while representing a positive step in assisting debt-burdened farmers, require additional flexibility to alleviate the agricultural credit crisis: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the United States Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That

(1) the President direct the Secretary of Agriculture to implement a Modified Debt Recovery Program which would require that the following administrative changes be made in the existing Farmers Home Administration Approved Lenders Program, insured loan program, limited resource loan program, and guaranteed loan program, all of which would be designed to benefit family farmers;

(a) all commercial lenders approved for participation in the Farmers Home Administration Approved Lenders Program, be authorized to process regular and limited resource insured farm operating and ownership loan applications, as well as farm loan guarantee applications, with the Farmers Home Administration reserving the right of final acceptance or rejection of such loans;

(b) all Farmers Home Administration insured or guaranteed farm loans processed by private lenders and approved by the Farmers Home Administration, shall permit the security for the entire credit package to be allocated between the private lender and the Farmers Home Administration on a prorata percentage basis directly related to the percentage of exposure of each;

(c) under such Modified Debt Recovery Program the maximum interest rate on approved lender-processed Farmers Home Administration loan guarantees shall be set at a rate not to exceed 2½ percent above the Federal funds rate; and

(d) under such a Modified Debt Recovery Program, the maximum Farmers Home Administration farm loan guarantee shall be set at 50 percent of the amount of the loan being financed by the private lender.

(2) the Secretary of Agriculture shall immediately advise the President of the total amount of additional Farmers Home Administration insured farm loan funds and farm loan guarantees that will be needed to fully implement such a Modified Debt Recovery Program; and

(3) the President shall immediately forward to Congress an emergency supplemental request for additional Farmers Home Administration direct insured farm loan funding and loan guarantee authority funding, to immediately implement such a Modified Debt Recovery Program and thus provide emergency agricultural credit to farmers who would otherwise be unable to plant their spring crops.

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, in case you weren't aware, America's farmers and the communities they support are experiencing severe difficulties. In Minnesota, some estimates place the number of farmers facing foreclosure in 1985 at 13,000. Nationwide, I'm sure the number exceeds 100,000.

What are farmers saying? They need higher prices for their products and lower priced credit. They want a chance to earn a living. They want credit to put a crop in this spring and they want a decent price for it at harvest. They want one program to help them through the next 10 months and another to help them make some long term planning decisions. And that's not much to ask for.

Well, until Congress figures out what kind of a farm policy farmers will have to guide them over the long term, the resolution I offer the Senate today may help them make it in the short term. Based on the Modified Debt Recovery Program developed by Rollie Lake and his colleagues at Communicating for Agriculture, this resolution simply requests the President to make additional modifications in existing Farmers Home Administration programs. My distinguished colleague from Montana, JOHN MELCHER, is familiar with this proposal, as Rollie Lake presented it to him at an informal hearing on agricultural credit problems last week. I ask unanimous consent that a description of the proposal be printed in the RECORD so that those who read it may better understand how the program works. While its implementation may require the extension of an additional $3 billion is direct, insured and guaranteed low interest loans, the price of not making the suggested changes could be the loss of rural America.

There being no objection, the description was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING—CA MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA is proposing a farm-debt restructuring plan designed to build on present programs, and target farm borrowers who are in financial difficulty yet who can be helped with the right program.

Today, many farmers find themselves in a financial bind. While about 30% of farmers have little or no debt and are doing well economically, there are between 30% and 40% of all farmers who have substantial debt and are in various stages of financial difficulty.

WHO ARE THESE FARMERS IN DIFFICULTY?

Most agricultural production, about 60% in 1982, comes from 205,000 farms (out of 2.4 million total farms) with more than $150,000 in annual sales. Narrowing our focus somewhat, of these farms with sales of $40,000 to $200,000.

19% have a debt-to-asset ratio of greater than 70%. That means, for every $10 of assets, the farmer has more than $7 of debt;

44% have a debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40%;

Farms with debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40% account for 71% of debt on farms in this sales class but only 36% of assets.

For farms in all sales categories with a greater than 70% debt-to-asset ratio, there is little hope of economic survival. In a recent Iowa study, 10% of the farmers fall into this category, hold 9% of the assets and 25% of the total debt.

Farmers with debt-to-asset ratios of greater than 40% are also facing financial difficulties. In that same Iowa study, 28% of the farmers with 30% of the assets and 65% of the debt fall into that category.

The Iowa survey further shows that farmers from all sales/size categories are in the over 40% group and that the majority of these are full-time family farmers.

WHAT IS THE NATURE OF THE FARM DEBT?

Nationally, the total farm debt has increased dramatically. In 1971, total farm debt totalled around $54 billion; in 1976, around $91 billion; and in 1984, total farm debt stands at $215 billion.

Farmers as a group have a much higher debt to income ratio now than in the past. In 1950, the overall debt-to-income ratio stood at less than 1; in 1960, it doubled to 2, changed to over 3 in the early 1970's, to 8 in 1980 and to 10 in 1984. Today the average farmer is trying to support $10 of debt for every $1 of income.

But even more important, the nature of the debt has changed dramatically. Debt today has a much shorter maturity.

Much of the debt is short term with interest rates tied to current loan rates. Even real estate debt is based on variable interest rates or is based on relatively short contract purchases. Maturities on a great deal of real estate debt has moved from 20–25 years in the 1960's and 1970's to 10–15 years or less today.

CAN FARMERS WITH HEAVY DEBT LOADS BE SAVED?

For a substantial segment of the 30% to 40% of farmers who have substantial debt and who are in various stages of financial difficulty, economic survival is a serious question. To help this group, representing between 720,000 and 960,000 farms out of 2.4 million total U.S. farms, there must be a restructuring of farm debt. This group, mostly full-time family farmers, were caught with too much debt at the wrong time, debt that was manageable under the prevailing economic conditions when it was incurred but became a crushing burden when conditions changed.

In the group of farmers, there are many good farmers facing bankruptcy for lack of a way to make the transition from an economy of high inflation, rising land values and low interest rates to one of low inflation, sinking land values and high interest rates.

Many of the farmers in this group can be helped and saved with the right debt restructuring programs.

CA'S DEBT RESTRUCTURING PROPOSAL

In order for farm debtors to pay off debt obligations, a major restructuring of indebtedness will be necessary.

The number one feature of any debt restructuring program is to stretch out principal payments into a manageable debt repayment schedule. The second major feature must provide for a lower rate of interest, and third, for farm lending to continue, the risks must be shared.

The CA proposal utilizes existing FmHA programs and expertise of commercial lenders to accomplish this.

These are the Approved Lenders Program, Insured Operating Loan Program and Limited Resource Program. CA's Debt Restructuring Plan modifies slightly these existing FmHA programs to create a program of modified recovery debt credit.

The heart of the CA debt restructuring proposal is the utilization of FmHA's Approved Lender Program, with some minor modifications.

FMHA APPROVED LENDER PROGRAM

Under FmHA's Approved Lenders Program, a qualified commercial lender is approved in advance to process FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The approved lender makes the loan, services the loan and collects the loan, thereby reducing the paperwork and time required for FmHA approval of loan guarantees. The lender is responsible for seeing that proper and adequate security is obtained and maintained. FmHA makes the final decision on farmers' eligibility, use of funds, and creditworthiness.

WHO DOES THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

In today's farm economy, there are many farmers whose debt-to-assets ratio between 40% and 70% who are caught in a 'credit availability gap.' These farmers are not in serious enough financial difficulty for consideration by the lender of last resort, FmHA. Yet, they do not quite meet the credit standards of private commercial lenders.

This group is a relatively stronger class of farm borrowers than normal FmHA borrowers. The problem for this class of farm borrowers is that their cash flow is inadequate under current high interest rates and low commodity prices, though their basic personal net worth and equity remains relatively strong. The security behind the loan is strong enough to satisfy the bank lender, yet the loan is classified by bank regulators as a classified loan. For the bank, every classified loan reduces the amount of available assets against which credit can be made available, resulting in less credit being available to farm borrowers.

THE FMHA LOAN GUARANTEE PROGRAM

FmHA Loan Guarantees are designed to provide the credit necessary for family farmers to conduct successful operations. The loans are to be used for the purchase of farm machinery and equipment, basic livestock, annual operating expenses and refinancing for authorized operating loan purposes. They may not be used to purchase or refinance land, finance lease costs or exceed $200,000. Interest rates may be fixed or variable and cannot exceed the rate common in the area. The terms of the loan may be up to seven years on basic security. Quality loans may be guaranteed up to 90% while high risk loans may receive less than a 50% guarantee.

HOW WILL THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

Utilizing FmHA's Loan Guarantee Program, the commercial lender will have the additional security to make a bankable loan to farmers who find themselves in a "credit gap". The program is not a bailout for lenders. Unless the loan meets requirements, with a reasonable chance for success FmHA will not approve it.

The program will help, first, by making credit available. Second, the banker will use the banks own (pre-FmHA approved) loan forms familiar to both the borrower and the banker, reducing FmHA's paper-handling load. Third, credit will be available on a much quicker basis, assuring that available guarantee loan funds reach eligible farmers as quickly as possible. Fourth, the banker and borrower are familiar with each other, helping to insure that better loans will be made. Fifth, the borrower is most likely to stretch out the loan payback. A commercial lender will normally have a maximum of five years on the loan while under the FmHA Loan Guarantee Program, a maximum of seven years is possible. This extra two years can assist the farm borrower in achieving an attainable cash flow-payback program.

CA'S MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA proposes to utilize FmHA's Approved Lenders Program and Operating Loan Program to achieve a significant plan for farm debt restructuring. To achieve this will require some modification of each of these programs.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE APPROVED LENDERS AND DIRECT LOAN PROGRAMS

A basic modification to the Approved Lenders Program is to place a maximum rate to be charged on interest. Under the Approved Lenders Program, interest rates may not exceed the prevailing interest rate in the areas in which the loan is made. At present, this interest rate is approximately 14½%.

Under the modified Approved Lenders Program, a maximum interest rate would be set at 2½% above Federal Funds. This would yield an interest rate of 12½% at October 22, 1984 rates.

Clearly, there is a need to lower interest rates in order to create a more achievable positive cash flow-debt repayment plan for many farm borrowers. In addition to the obvious advantage of lower interest rates, by lowering the maximum interest rate which a commercial lender may charge under the Approved Lenders Loan Program, the result will be to create opportunities for additional farm borrowers to take advantage of the Loan Guarantee Program. A lower maximum interest rate will encourage the lender to graduate the borrower to a regular commercial status.

The second basic change in the Approved Lenders Program would help to expand the program to include the commercial lenders' ability to those in the creditability gap.

FMHA OPERATING LOAN PROGRAM

FmHA Operating Loans are made for both operating expenses and farm ownership. Ownership loans may carry an interest rate as low as 5½% and may be written up to 40 years. Operating loans may carry an interest rate as low as 7¼% and may be written up to 15 years. Under the Direct Loan Program, appraisals are done by the FmHA and security in the loan is named and itemized per lender.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE DISTRICT LOAN PROGRAM

In order to restructure farm debt, lower interest rates and longer payback terms will be required to attain a manageable, attainable cash flow for many farm borrowers.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program would incorporate into the Approved Lenders Program the use of FmHA Operating Loans in the same manner as the FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The pre-FmHA approved commercial lender would process the paperwork for FmHA Operating Loans, using the commercial lender's forms. FmHA would still have the final say-so on the loan under a shortened turn around approval or denial. Appraisals would be done by the pre-FmHA approved commercial lender or qualified appraiser. The main change in the present FmHA Direct Operating Loan Program would be to share security on a prorated dollar value basis. This last change is important to create an environment where the financial risk is shared and one which will create far fewer complications than the present system of named security.

BLENDED CREDIT ILLUSTRATION

Under the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program, there can be a significant debt restructuring which will assist present financially troubled borrowers who have a stronger asset base yet who can neither qualify for FmHA loans or regular commercial lender loans.

As an illustration: Farm Borrower with $100,000 of indebtedness—cash flow shows $21,000 available for debt retirement.

Example 1—Farm Borrower with Commercial Lender: Loan Term—5 years; Loan Interest Rate—14½%.

Cash Required for:
Principal Reduction	$20,000
Interest Payment	14,500
Total	34,500
Payment Deficit	13,500

Example 2—Farm Borrower under Approved Lenders Program (no modifications): Loan Term—7 years; Loan Interest Rate—14½%.

Cash Required for:
Principal Reduction	$14,285
Interest Payment	14,500
Total	28,785
Payment Deficit	7,785

Example 3—Farm Borrower under CA Modified Debt Recovery Program Debt is divided between Approved Lender Loan and Limited Resource Loan (3A) and Insured Loan Programs (3B).

	Approved lender loan (3A)	Approved lender loan (3B)
FmHA Guaranteed Loan	$50,000	$40,000
Loan Term (years)	7	7
Loan Interest Rate (percent)	12½	12½
Payment required for:
Principal Reduction	$7,143	$5,714
Interest Payment	$6,250	$5,000
Total	$13,393	$10,714

	Limited resource	Insured loan
$50,000 FmHA Operating Loans	$50,000	$60,000
Loan Term (years)	15	15
Loan Interest Rate (percent)	7¼	10¼
Payment required for:
Principal Reduction	$3,333	$4,000
Interest Payment	$3,625	$6,150
Total	$6,958	$10,150
Total Payment Required for:
Principal Reduction	$10,476	$9,714
Interest Payment	$9,875	$11,150
Total	$20,351	$20,864
Cash Flow Balance	$649	$136

From the above example, the Modified Debt Recovery Program has accomplished a significant reduction in interest rates and has extended payments over a longer period of time to achieve a reasonable and achievable cash flow.

The Modified Debt Recovery Program covers the three areas of need: restructuring of debt, adjustment of interest and sharing of risk. The Modified Debt Recovery Program shares the risk by bringing the Government in on a percentage of the Approved Lender Program. Debt is restructured by adding the Direct Lending Program, and interest is lowered with a combination of ability through the Direct Lending Program to lower to a minimum of 7¼% and a maximum of 2½% plus Federal Funds on the Approved Lender portion. The Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the assets of the FmHA, the types of funds which are already available and adds the expertise of Commercial Lenders. The Modified Debt Recovery Program would only be in place long enough to carry agriculture through this present period of adjustment.

SENATE RESOLUTION 68—CONGRATULATING THE PEOPLE OF CYPRUS ON THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THEIR INDEPENDENCE

Mr. TRIBLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 68

Whereas on October 1, 1985, the Republic of Cyprus will mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of its independence;

Whereas despite the hardship of twenty-five years of strife, the people of Cyprus have remained strong and steadfast in their commitment to a free and unified nation;

Whereas on January 17, 1985, under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary General, direct talks were held between Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot leaders to establish a framework for negotiations and to identify principles to be addressed in an eventual agreement on reunification of Cyprus;

Whereas continuation of these talks holds out strong hope for resolving the divisions on Cyprus and bringing peace to that long-troubled island;

Whereas the United States supports the efforts of the United Nations to help the two communities on Cyprus reach a framework for bringing a just and lasting peace to that nation;

Whereas a resolution of the Cyprus situation would ease divisions within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) which currently weaken NATO's southern flank, and would help to stabilize relations among the United States, Greece, and Turkey;

Whereas the United States can contribute to continuation of these talks and help foster intercommunal understanding on Cyprus by supporting cooperative efforts aimed at rebuilding a unified nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That (a) the Senate hereby congratulates the people of Cyprus on the twenty-fifth anniversary of their independence.

(b)(1) It is the sense of the Senate that the United States Government should strive to establish a Cooperative Development Fund for Cyprus (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Fund") similar to the fund proposed for establishment by President Reagan in May 1984.

(2) Monies from the Fund should be available only for—

(A) projects that would benefit all the people of Cyprus and foster intercommunal cooperation in that nation when a fair and equitable agreement to the Cyprus dispute has been reached; or

(B) projects that would foster intercommunal cooperation in Cyprus by substantially strengthening the commitment of both parties to good-faith negotiations leading to a just and lasting settlement on Cyprus.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the Secretary of State.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I am submitting a resolution today aimed at helping to resolve the ongoing dispute on the island of Cyprus. This measure would congratulate the people of Cyprus on the 25th anniversary of their independence. It would also reaffirm America's intention of helping to rebuild a free and unified nation.

This resolution is similar to one that will be introduced in the House by Representative JAMES FLORIO, and it has two purposes. First, it would commend the people of Cyprus for the courage and forbearance they have shown during the past 25 years. Second, it would signal our intention to help the peace process by creating a cooperative development fund for Cyprus similar to that proposed by President Reagan during the 98th Congress.

Mr. President, the people of Cyprus attained independence through a long and arduous process. In the 25 years since independence, the Cypriots have continually faced strife and hardship.

As Americans, we admire those who persevere in the face of such challenges. We respect those who remain steadfast in their commitment to democracy and freedom. Throughout their first quarter-century of independence, the people of Cyprus have displayed these qualities in abundance. They have not wavered in their search for freedom, and I believe the United States should commend their heroism.

Today, the effort to achieve a unified Cyprus will also require acts of bravery. It demands trust where there has been little in the past. I believe the United States should help to foster that trust by supporting the idea of a cooperative development fund for Cyprus. Moneys would be provided by the United States and other nations when an equitable peace agreement is reached on Cyprus or when substantial progress is made toward that end. Some funds might also be provided prior to that time if the moneys would provide a significant boost to the Cyprus negotiations.

Many of my colleagues will remember that President Reagan proposed such a cooperative fund during the 98th Congress. At that time, the President said quite correctly that peace cannot be bought. But the President added that peacemakers should know that the United States is prepared to make every effort to transform their labors into an enduring achievement.

The cooperative fund proposed by President Reagan would have been made available for projects that benefited both the Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot communities. It would have nurtured the forces of democracy and cooperation on the island.

Though the House of Representatives approved the cooperative fund overwhelmingly, it did not pass the full Congress. I believe this is an appropriate time for Congress to reaffirm its willingness to pursue this course.

Our willingness to fund cooperative efforts can provide each party on Cyprus with a stake in the well-being of the other. We can also help to ensure that the seminal years of joint efforts take place in an atmosphere of growth and opportunity for both communities.

No one doubts that the stakes are very high in this search for peace. The people of Cyprus deserve it. The NATO alliance needs it. And the security interests of the United States and other Western nations would be well served by it.

I believe that we have rarely been closer to a just and lasting settlement to the Cyprus dispute than we are today. We, in the Congress, should seize the opportunity to nurture the forces of peace and reconciliation on the island.

This resolution commends the courage that the people of Cyprus have shown in the past. It also signals our intention to foster the courage that will be necessary in the future if Cyprus is to be a free, peaceful, and unified nation. I would welcome my colleagues' cosponsorship of this measure.

SENATE RESOLUTION 69—PROVIDING FOR REPRESENTATION BY THE SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 69

Whereas, the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et. al., Civil Action No. 83-2896DT, is pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan;

Whereas, plaintiff has served trial subpoenas for testimony and documents on Senators Donald W. Riegle, Jr., and Carl Levin;

Whereas, these subpoenas may be answerable by members of Senator Riegle's and Senator Levin's staffs;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent members and employees of the Senate in civil actions relating to their official responsibilities;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of a member or an employee of the Senate is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Senator Riegle, Senator Levin and members of their respective staffs in the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al.

SEC. 2. That Senator Riegle and Senator Levin and members of their respective staffs whom they may designate are authorized to testify and to produce documents in the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al., except when the Senators' attendance at the Senate is necessary for the performance of their legislative duties, and except concerning matters that they and the Senate Legal Counsel or his representative determine are privileged from disclosure.

SENATE RESOLUTION 70—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURES BY THE COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. PACKWOOD, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 70

(c) The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1986.

(d) Expenses of the committee under this section shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries of employees paid at an annual rate.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Rhode Island, Senator PELL, in cosponsoring S. 401, legislation to repeal section 308 of the 1985 Defense Authorization Act.

This provision, added as an amendment to the fiscal year 1985 defense authorization bill last year, places a cap on Pentagon expenditures for consultants, studies and analyses, management support contracts, and other services. As such, I do not object to its intent; indeed, I support the concept of clamping down on excessive costs for outside consultants.

This provision had apparently caused little problem for the Army and the Air Force, both of which have managed to continue the funding of essential consulting services. In the case of the Navy, however, it has been so strictly interpreted that it threatens to cause major problems for a number of firms which have contracted for essential consultive services.

The problem seems to be one of overly strict interpretation. The Navy has officially advised me that it interprets the provision to "constitute a legal limitation on subdivisions of appropriations" and that "it will be necessary to cancel or defer sufficient planned contract effort in defense programs which were authorized and appropriated to ensure that they (Navy) complies with the functional limitation contained in the authorization act."

Essentially what this means is that the Navy will proceed very cautionary with regard to consultive contracts, even if they are part of ongoing programs for which money is routinely appropriated. Such a strict interpretation is what has caused the problem.

In Rhode Island, most notably in the Newport area where the Navy maintains a strong presence, section 308 has caused a great deal of consternation. Funding for essential support services has been interrupted, layoffs have been scheduled, and there has arisen a great deal of uncertainty. In all, some 5,000 persons in the Newport area work for firms which have contracts with the Navy and who are potentially affected by this provision of the law passed last year, and their concern is both understandable and justified.

Mr. President, the bill introduced by Senator PELL and myself is motivated by the fact that in the absence of clear definitions and guidelines, section 308 is creating more problems than it is solving.

The bill we have introduced, S. 401, would repeal section 308, but would direct the Secretary of Defense to provide within 6 months a standardized auditing procedure to identify and control expenditures in the future. I am not opposed to legislation that is designed to control the costs of outside consultative services, but section 308, at least as it has affected Navy contracts in my own State, sweeps with too broad a brush to do the job properly.●

D. MICHAEL HARVEY: 25 YEARS OF SERVICE

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, tomorrow, February 8, 1985, marks the 25th anniversary of service to the Federal Government for D. Michael Harvey, the chief counsel for the minority of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. Yesterday, my colleague and ranking minority member on the committee, Senator JOHNSTON, detailed the long history of distinguished Federal service which Mike Harvey has had, and I will not repeat that history now.

I did want to join Senator JOHNSTON, and, I am sure, the other members of the committee and the Senate, in expressing my appreciation for his outstanding service and my deep admiration and respect for the knowledge and skill which he has brought to the Senate.

There is a tendency at times to make arbitrary characterizations of committee staff as either majority or minority. It is the true measure of the professional staff when they can overcome those characterizations and bring a professional approach to the committee business which commands respect from all members. Mike is and has been the epitome of such professionalism. He has been the definition of a civil servant and I know of no member who has relied on his advice who has ever been disappointed. The trust and respect which he earned while serving under Senator Metcalf and Senator Jackson on subcommittee and then as chief counsel to the committee until 1981 has not been diminished by his service on the minority staff of the committee.

I want to join Senator JOHNSTON in congratulating Mike on his past 25 years and to thank Mike for his service to the Senate. I am grateful that we in the majority continue to have his wise advise and counsel and I look forward to having that counsel for many years to come.●

ON BEHALF OF SOVIET JEWRY

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, while it may be true that we are entering a new stage in United States-Soviet relations, I wonder what effects the negotiations in Geneva will have on an issue very important in this country—human rights and specifically Soviet Jewry. We are experiencing an all time low in emigration from the Soviet Union at the present time. In 1984 only 898 Soviet Jews were allowed to leave their country. This compares with a figure of 51,000 back in 1979.

As we have seen a geometric decrease in Jewish emigration we have also seen a proportional increase in persecution of Soviet Jews. This places the community in a desperate catch-22 situation. They can't leave and if they stay they face extinction as a people. The recent illustration of this situation is the series of arrests and sentencings of a number of Hebrew teachers and Jewish culturalists.

Victims of such treatment include Mark Nepomniashchy, sentenced this week to 3 years in labor camp, Alexander Kholmiansky sentenced last week to 1½ years in prison, and Yuli Edelshtein, sentenced in December to 3 years in prison.

These three individuals were all actively involved in trying to maintain Jewish life in the Soviet Union. They were refused permission to leave and live as Jews elsewhere. As a result of their simple wish to live as they choose they have suffered at the hands of the Soviet authorities.

As we sit and negotiate with the Russians in Geneva let us remember our experience with them in other negotiations and insist on compliance with those human rights agreements—for without honoring those, real peace is truly impossible.●

ERA-ABORTION CONNECTION FEARED BY CATHOLIC BISHOPS

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the equal rights amendment and various versions of human life amendments have again been introduced in both Houses of Congress. Several bills on the subjects of equal rights and abortion have also been introduced. We all know that ERA and abortion are two of the most vexing public issues of the day. I favor a human life amendment and have been the chief sponsor of one version for a number of years. I oppose the equal rights amendment, and one of the reasons for this opposition is my fear that ERA will become a tool for strengthening and broadening abortion rights.

I have made occasional insertions into the RECORD on the subject of ERA's potential effect on abortion. For example, on April 25, 1984, I inserted a statement entitled "Catholic Bishops See Abortion-Era Connection." Today, I wish to update that information.

Last November the Nation's Catholic bishops met here in Washington. Their draft pastoral letter on the morality of the American economic system attracted much attention; less attention was given to their consideration of the equal rights amendment. Archbishop John L. May, chairman of the Ad Hoc Interdisciplinary Committee on the Equal Rights Amendment made his report to the assembled bishops. Accompanying the archbishop's report was a legal assessment of ERA prepared by the United States Catholic Conference's office of general counsel.

The report and the legal assessment total more than 30 pages. Pros and cons are discussed and interested readers will want to review both documents in full since only the abortion problem is being treated here. In his own report, the archbishop quoted extensively from the legal document's subsection on abortion which is reprinted below in full.

The archbishop concluded his report with this statement:

[T]he Ad Hoc Committee . . . does not now recommend a change in the Conference's position. However, it does suggest that the present text and legislative context of ERA demand serious reflection and a reasoned objectivity by all who must judge its value as an amendment to our Constitution. It is our hope that the Report of our General Counsel will contribute significantly to the process, and to that end we have authorized its public distribution. Meanwhile we continue to reserve definitive judgment on the proposed ERA as we continue to hope for a more fully developed formulation of the amendment. Such a version would, we believe, attract wider acceptance from all Americans and the Congress.

I ask that the introduction and subsection on abortion from section VII of the general counsel's be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

VII. IMPLICATIONS OF CONCERN FOR CHURCHES AND THE PEOPLE THEY SERVE

The implications of ERA have also given rise to concerns in diverse areas of law and public policy. There follows a discussion of certain areas of major concern to churches and the people they serve. Such an analysis is essential to an objective consideration of ERA, and to provide balance in the public debate by augmenting the available public commentary.

A. ABORTION

1. Substantive abortion rights

The potential effect of ERA on a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy is limited because Roe v. Wade and kindred cases are the law. Courts will not attribute to Congress an intent to do an unnecessary act. There is no explicit indication in the text or legislative history that Congress intends ERA to reinforce a right of abortion. Indeed, the legislative history reveals the absence of a congressional consensus on abortion.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, it is reasonable to consider ERA as possessing the potential to buttress the substantive right of abortion. The possible permutations of fact and legal principle under the Roe v. Wade doctrine have not been exhausted. There is some room for the regulation of the abortion right based upon the compelling interest of the state in the life and health of the mother (second and third trimester) and unborn child (third trimester). This approach in the theory of the cases has already been criticized by three members of the Supreme Court, and the future course of the law seems somewhat uncertain. Although it is unlikely the Court will overrule the Roe v. Wade line of cases in their fundamental precepts, it is not unreasonable to anticipate more favorable consideration of well-founded restrictions of abortion in the law. The present Court has manifested its willingness to reassess its decisions in other vital areas, and no reason appears why abortion must be an exception to that salutary process.

These observations counsel a sensitivity to the more subtle potentialities of ERA in the field of abortion. If there is any room for the meaningful restriction of abortion under present legal theory or future holdings, ERA could serve to diminish those prospects. In Roe v. Wade, the Court grounded the woman's right to terminate her pregnancy in considerations of her health. The right to protect one's health and reproductive interests is grounded in the constitutional right of privacy. Under ERA, the Court would likely view abortion as a type of medical treatment, although not identical, to other types. Accordingly, there is legitimate concern that ERA could lead to the invalidation of laws which deny to women a right not denied to men, namely, access to forms of medical "treatment" needed to protect health, including abortion. In this way, ERA could buttress the Roe v. Wade right of abortion. It could fortify the principal holding in Roe v. Wade, i.e. the right of privacy encompasses "a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy."

2. Public funding of abortion

Although Roe v. Wade and other cases have established a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy, there is presently no federal constitutional right to public financing of abortion. The denial of such funding does not deprive women of any constitutional right, including rights under the Equal Protection Clause. However, under ERA it is likely that funding restrictions would be invalidated if certain established principles are applied.

Like pregnancy and childbirth, abortion is a procedure which only women can undergo. Because ERA would probably render sex-based classifications suspect in the sense that term is used under the Equal Protection Clause, a law excluding abortions from a governmentally-sponsored, comprehensive medical program would be subject to strict judicial scrutiny. The Supreme Court has already held that the government's interest in fetal life does not become compelling until after viability. Consequently, a law excluding pre-viability abortions from a comprehensive health benefit program might well not survive strict judicial scrutiny, whether the program is based on the state's interest in fetal life or in encouraging childbirth over abortion. Further, in view of the mother's somewhat qualified right to terminate her pregnancy after viability, the same result could follow for this period of gestation as well.

In a very recent decision, a majority of the Pennsylvania Commonwealth Court upheld the state's exclusion of funding for abortions (with certain exceptions) against claims that it violated the Equal Protection Clause and Pennsylvania's ERA. The court held (two judges dissenting) that the exclusion did not involve a gender-based classification cognizable under that state's ERA. The decision has been appealed to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. The fact that the court was divided points up the genuineness of this question with respect to the federal ERA. The case also confirms the difficulties of predicting results under ERA. Further, one decision involving a state ERA by a state intermediate appellate court is of slight precedential value. Especially is this so since the court did not apply the standard of strict judicial scrutiny, as ERA seems likely to require.●

Rev. L.H. (Chip) Battle, Warrenton Bible Fellowship Church, Warrenton, VA, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we bow our hearts beore You, the giver and sustainer of life. We humbly acknowledge that every knee in Heaven and on Earth shall bow before You on that day that You are rightfully recognized as Lord over all creation.

I thank You that these dedicated men and women are seeking to fulfill the responsibility that You have given them of governing our land well. I ask that You would give them a special sense of wisdom, kindness, and justice as they seek to faithfully discharge these responsibilities.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a concurrent resolution of the following title:

S. Con. Res. 12. Concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the Senate from February 7 or 8, 1985 to February 18, 1985, and an adjournment of the House from February 7, 1985 to February 19, 1985.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—RESOLUTION TO SEAT RICHARD D. McINTYRE AS A MEMBER OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House, and I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 52) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

H. RES. 52

Whereas, Richard D. McIntyre won the November 6, 1984, election in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana by 34 votes according to the certificates of election filed by the county clerks from the District's 15 counties; and

Whereas, the Indiana Secretary of State, Edwin J. Simcox, acting in accordance with his duties as set forth in the Indiana Code (Ann. Sec. 3-1-26-9), certified Richard D. McIntyre as the Representative from Indiana's Eighth Congressional District; and

Whereas the Clerk of the House stated on January 3, 1985 in opening the 99th Congress that he had "prepared the official roll of the Representatives-elect" which included McIntyre's name. The Clerk stated: "Certificates of election covering the 435 seats in the 99th Congress have been received by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the names of these persons whose credentials show that they were regularly elected as Representatives in accordance with the laws of their respective States and of the United States will be called." McIntyre's name was called and he cast his vote for Robert H. Michel as Speaker of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas the majority of the House of Representatives on January 3, 1985 voted in House Resolution 1 not to seat Richard D. McIntyre as Representative from Indiana's Eighth Congressional District despite has certificate of election issued pursuant to the laws of Indiana; and

Whereas House Resolution 1 is contrary to the precedents of the House of Representatives in that the holder of a certificate of election not tainted by fraud or irregularities has previously been granted a prima facie right to a seat with the final right being referred to the Committee on House Administration; and

Whereas Richard D. McIntyre received 418 votes more than Francis X. McCloskey in a recount of the ballots cast in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District pursuant to Indiana Code (Ann. Sec. 3-1-27 et seq.); Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized and directed to administer the oath of office to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Richard D. McIntyre.

Resolved, That the question of the final right of Mr. McIntyre to a seat in the 99th Congress is referred to the Committee on House Administration.

□ 1130

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois. In the opinion of the Chair, the resolution constitutes a question of the privileges of the House under article I, section 5 of the Constitution and under rule IX.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. WRIGHT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on House Administration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] or his designees, and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this motion involves a disputed election between Mr. McCloskey, the Democratic candidate, and Mr. McIntyre, the Republican candidate in the Eighth District of Indiana.

On January 3, exercising its constitutional responsibility to be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, the House voted to seat neither of the contested candidates and to refer the matter to the Committee on House Administration, in order that an entire, thorough, complete inquiry might be made.

Attempt now is being made to overturn that action of the House. My motion would simply refer this motion of the gentleman from Illinois to that committee which already is moving to act in a responsible way on this contest.

To do otherwise would be to express a lack of confidence in the duly constituted committees of this House. There is no reason whatsoever, Mr. Speaker, for any Member of this House to question the integrity or the intentions of the Committee on House Administration.

That committee, exercising its jurisdiction, has on numerous occasions undertaken careful and exhaustive inquiries into elections that were contested. Never once so far as I know, certainly not in my memory, has that committee been accused of having acted in a partisan way or in any way contrary to the facts.

As a matter of fact, in the last Congress a subcommittee chaired by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] heard the case involving the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD] and ruled in favor of the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD] a Republican Member of the House.

The committee ruled on the basis of fact, and that is how the committee will rule this year, if given that privilege. The House has referred this matter to its own House committee. To take it away from the committee now would be to express disfavor of the committee, to express our lack of confidence in the integrity of the committee and in the integrity of the House procedures.

For those reasons and for reasons which will be further elucidated, I believe this matter should be returned to that committee, this motion referred to the committee, and the committee given the opportunty to act.

The chairman of that committee has given public assurances that the committee will act expeditiously. There is no intention to delay; the intention is precisely the opposite. We intend to act soon but not sooner than the facts are in, the votes are counted, and qualified voters are given the privilege of having their votes taken into account.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I appreciate the distinguished majority leader yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on House Administration is well aware of its heavy responsibility in this matter. As chairman, I have absolutely no preconceived judgments about the issues that have been raised in this contested election, or about its likely outcome.

I want to assure the Members I feel confident that I speak for the other members of the committee, as well as myself, in saying that our minds are open and will remain so until all the facts are in.

To gather these facts, I am informing the House that I have already appointed a task force, with Mr. PANETTA, of California, as chairman; BILL CLAY, of Missouri, a member; and BILL THOMAS representing the minority side on this task force.

They are prepared to move as quickly as possible toward a resolution of this unfortunate situation. For my part, I want to completely assure all of my colleagues, both sides of the aisle, the citizens of the Eighth Congressional District in Indiana, that the Committee on House Administration will conduct its investigation in a manner that is thorough, complete, fair and impartial like we have done all of these years when election matters have been referred to the House Administration Committee.

I again want to pledge to you our best efforts to uphold the trust that has been placed upon us.

Mr. WRIGHT. I defer at this time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] for purposes of debate only.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he many consume to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I am offering this resolution to seat Rick McIntyre, the duly certified Congressman from the Eighth District of Indiana.

The resolution is conditional, pending a final outcome of the House Administration Committee's involvement in this matter.

Before I get to the specifics of the case, allow me to dwell for just a moment on some facts that put it in historic context. Our Library of Congress found that from 1920 to 1974, there were 11 occasions when a House race was won by fewer than 100 votes. Oddly enough, this is not the first time that the Eighth District of Indiana has been involved in a close race.

In a curious, historic irony, in 1930 incumbent Albert Vestall of the Indiana Eighth District, beat challenger Claude Bell by nine votes.

That is right. Nine votes out of 88,397 cast. Do you know what happened when Congressman Vestall won by such a tiny margin? Why his election was not even contested. But, my, how times have changed.

In the election of 1984, the people of the Eighth District of Indiana voted in another close House election. A certificate of election, based on final election night results, and the correction of two tabulating errors, was issued to Mr. McIntyre. He has since won a recount all in conformance with Indiana law, not by 9 votes, not by a count less than 100, but by 418 votes.

Mr. McIntyre is, in the eyes of the people of Indiana, a duly elected and certified representative to this House. But he is not representing the people of Indiana because this House has barred him from doing so in an unprecedented display of raw legislative power.

The people of the Eighth District of Indiana have been summarily disenfranchised.

I am therefore introducing this resolution for two reasons: First, because what is happening to the people of the Eighth District of Indiana is wrong. It is unprecedented. It is unconstitutional and it is unjust.

Second, if the majority persists in this course, the reputation of this institution will be severely damaged.

Representative Rick McIntyre, with the certificate of election given to him by the people of Indiana, has a prima facie right to take this seat.

The House Administration Committee can pursue any line of inquiries it so desires. And I do not question the integrity of that committee or any member thereof. But while this is going on Rick McIntyre is entitled to be seated by tradition, by precedent and by law. The facts dictate that Representative Rick McIntyre should be seated. Justice demands that Representative Rick McIntyre be seated.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot content ourselves, nor can the people out in the Eighth District of Indiana be content or satisfied with the caliber of their representation, simply because House Resolution No. 1 on opening day provided for a staffed office in Washington. So what. Roughly 500,000 people have no voice or vote in the 99th Congress. They have no one to speak for them like I am speaking today. Instead they have two men clamoring to speak for them. This is not representation. It is a tragedy.

I have no quarrel with that provision of House Resolution No. 1 which directed the House Administration Committee to examine this election and report its findings to the House. That is consistent with the precedents of this great body. In fact, my resolution would defer to the Committee on House Administration to make a final determination.

Specifically, the last paragraph reads:

Resolved, That the question of the final right of Mr. McIntyre to a seat in the 99th Congress is referred to the Committee on House Administration.

The language is totally consistent with section 5 of the Constitution and all of our precedents. It sets out clearly that this body can decide the final right to representation based on election results.

We also have a law—the contested elections law—which provides the mechanism by which a candidate can question the results of an election. If there is cause for questioning an election—I mean real cause, not closeness, we have had close elections, but real cause—then Mr. McCloskey could have filed a grievance under this law.

Mr. McCloskey did not file. One has to ask why?

One final point. The same law has another purpose: To insure that the citizens of Indiana or any other State are represented in this body while a contested election is being resolved by the House Administration Committee. Here again, the law is being ignored. You cannot get away from that fact. There is a void here, a vacuum, no representation.

We always have provided heretofore that there is representation here while the House Administration Committee follows its course.

We have had an official recount. Are we now going to be told this afternoon that that recount is invalid? When will this ever cease to happen? When will we go back to judging these issues by procedures rather than by politics?

Back in my hometown of Peoria, a former Member of this body, Abe Lincoln, once said:

No man is good enough to govern another man without the other's consent.

And it can be applied to the case before us.

The majority is, in effect, seeking to govern the people of the Eight District of Indiana and of the State of Indiana without their consent.

I would ask Members of the majority to reconsider while there is still time and while the reputation of this House can still recover.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that Members cast a "no" vote on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.].

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset I do not like at all to be placed in the position that I am today with my party. I am doing this because I think what we are being asked to do today is not right. I have no feeling against either one of these gentlemen. I do not know them. I know that the House Administration Committee will do a fine job in what it is constitutionally appointed to do.

My only thought is this. I wish my colleagues to listen to me for just a moment on some dates.

This election was held on November 6. Between November 8 and November 21, Mr. McIntyre filed a petition to recount votes in eight counties. On November 27, Mr. McCloskey filed a suit to enjoin Mr. McIntyre from having a recount on the basis that the House of Representatives had the exclusive right to determine its membership and that the State of Indiana did not have the right to declare an election contest. Also, the second count in that petition was that the secretary of state be ordered to certify him, Mr. McCloskey, as a winner.

Now, this was a Federal court case. It was filed in November 1984. Judge Brooks wrote an opinion on December 7, 1984. Here is what he said. He refused to grant the relief sought by Mr. McCloskey against Mr. McIntyre. He said that he could not find any reading in the statute which gave the right of the Congress to take over the right of a contested election contest in a State. He said it in this opinion.

He also stated that he was not going to mandate that the secretary of state certify a winner. Although he did say rightfully so, that the secretary of state had a continuing obligation.

He says:

In my reading of the Statute, it says that he has a continuing duty to recertify at any time the totals that are given to him, I think, he has a duty to recertify those totals, whatever the outcome may be.

Now, no one is questioning—certainly I am not—we are not questioning the right of the House Administration Committee to do what it is constitutionally mandated to do.

□ 1150

The only position I am taking here today is that we, in my opinion, do not have the right to refuse to seat Mr. McIntyre. He has been certified. He has been certified twice by the secretary of state as the winner. I do not know whether he is the winner or whether he is not. That is not the point.

We had the same type of situation, Adam Clayton Powell. Many of you are familiar with that case. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed a lower court and a circuit court, which held that we had the right to eliminate or expunge him from the membership in this body. The Supreme Court held we did not have that right and mandated that we put him back, which we did.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Let me finish, please.

Mr. JACOBS. The gentleman is misstating the case. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. No, sir; I am not misstating. You read it.

Mr. JACOBS. I wrote a book about it. The gentleman is misstating the case.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, in the case that we have here today, we have language by this judge dealing with this specific point, and I read it. I am reading on page 3 of his opinion:

So, they updated that. They mention specifically—

Talking about the Federal Contested Election Act, which was passed in 1969—

That it completely overhauls and modernizes election contest procedures in the House. But nowhere does it refer to any change in the intent to preempt the States from holding their own recounts.

That has been decided.

I think the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Abbitt, it was his testimony, and he is the one who introduced it, said that it is:

Pure and simple, they are prescribing a procedural framework for the prosecution, defense, and disposition of contested election cases patterned upon the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Now, listen to this next sentence:

One of the other Congressmen says that a question occurs to me as to whether the Committee has dealt with the question of whether or not the certified winner of a general election would be seated pending the outcome of the contest.

That is the question we have got here today.

Here is what the judge said:

I think Mr. Abbitt says, "We did not intend to change any basic rule of law. This is purely and simply a procedural matter * * *.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. May I have an additional 1 minute?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield the gentleman 30 seconds.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Now, when you go back to the basic rule of law, that is that this Congress has a mandate to seat a person if he has been certified as the winner.

It is up to the House Administration Committee to make a determination as to whether or not in the future that he is or is not the winner.

I would say that if this were reversed, if Mr. McCloskey were in the same shape that Mr. McIntyre is in, he would have the same right to be seated while the House Administration Committee works its will.

I certainly think that this gentleman should be seated.

Mr. WRIGHT. May I have a statement of the time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] has 24 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has 17½ minutes remaining.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] the chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on House Administration.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the majority leader for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the fact that this is an issue that transcends this election. This is an issue that, in my judgment, directly points to whether or not the House Administration Committee has the integrity to be fair. We voted to send the results of this election to the House Administration Committee, and our chairman is very distinguished.

Now, in the last session I had the dubious task, believe me—it is not the kind of task one seeks—to chair a task force on a contested election. It was already mentioned. The gentleman from California, a Republican Member, was being challenged in terms of whether or not the election was fair. On the committee we had the gentleman from Washington, who is a Democrat, and we had the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] who was also from California and Republican. No one challenged the makeup of the committee, no one challenged whether or not we would be fair. And this election was called the most serious election violation—in southern California—in the history of that area of the State.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. OAKAR. I only have 3 minutes. If the gentleman would like to give me some time, I would be happy to extend to him that courtesy.

We had very, very serious allegations. There was the allegation that there was a mass conspiracy to deface voting booklets because one of the candidates was a write-in candidate. Fraud, theft were also alleged.

Now, we worked on this election for many, many hours. We sent our legal staff to California directly to look at the evidence, in fact. They came back with massive amounts of reading material that I personally read, and, believe me, I had better things to do with my time. And I personally, after having an extensive hearing, made the recommendation—and I am as partisan as anybody in this House—that the Republican Member continued to be certified. And that was the recommendation I initiated to my committee members.

Now, there was not one Democrat on that House Administration Committee—and, by the way, the chairman at the time was a Democrat from California, who voted against our recommendation. The House Administration has been distinguished by its fairness.

Now, I want to say to my colleagues that we are not only dealing with a contested election here.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman's time has expired.

Ms. OAKAR. We are dealing with the view that——

May I have 30 seconds, Mr. Majority Leader?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield 30 seconds additionally.

Ms. OAKAR. What we are dealing with is the integrity of a committee that is objective. And that also should be counted in your vote. Do you trust the House Administration Committee to be fair?

And I suggest to you that it has always been fair and will continue to remain so and can be objective in this election, in discussing and deciding the results of the McCloskey/McIntyre contested election.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I do not know if I have further time.

Mr. PICKLE. Would the gentleman yield the gentlewoman 1 extra minute?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield the gentlewoman an extra minute for the purpose of yielding to the gentleman from Texas.

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. I see nothing wrong about referring this to the House Administration Committee. It is a serious question. And most of us are not familiar with all of the facts and have difficulty in passing judgment with some finality.

I am concerned, though, that if you refer this to the House Administration that it might be interpreted as a final act and a final delay, and the people, then, of Indiana, it would seem to me, from the district would be entitled to some representation.

Would the gentlewoman tell me, the chairman of the subcommittee, would she promise the House that that subcommittee would have a report back to us within 30 days, within 40 days, within some specific time? If we could have that assurance, I would say that it is perfectly proper for us to look into it. But without that assurance, I have grave doubts that we are proceeding in the right channel.

Can the gentlewoman tell us she would report to the House?

Ms. OAKAR. I am not on the task force at this time. I think that is a question for the chairman of the Committee on House Administration. But I can tell you this, that the individuals on that task force will proceed as expeditiously as possible, knowing how important it is to the House.

Mr. PICKLE. From this Member's standpoint, I see nothing would keep us from giving a report of finality within 30 or 40 days, and I would expect that if some motion were made at that time, we ought to look at it again.

Ms. OAKAR. That might be possible.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the more I read the more I understand why the opponents of self-government don't like us to bring up the case of Adam Clayton Powell.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Powell versus McCormack that "the House is without power to exclude any Member-elect who meets the Constitution's requirements for membership." How did the Court arrive at this landmark decision? By studying the history that made this rule an essential part of the Constitution.

First, the Court studied John Wilkes, the Englishman who kept getting elected by his constituents to the House of Commons, even though the House would not seat him.

As it turns out Wilkes had quite an impact on the American colonists, who sought his advice and took as one of their slogans, "Wilkes and Liberty." Their critics called them Wilkites; they called themselves Sons of Liberty.

In fact, Wilkes and his exclusion from Parliament symbolized to colonial America, King George III's attitude about the thing the colonists craved most: self-government.

What a coincidence, then, that on the same day, John Wilkes argued against the blockade of Boston Harbor, he argued to expunge the record of his exclusion. On the exclusion issue he said:

If . . . his constituents should differ in opinion from the majority of this House, if they should think him fit to be reelected, he ought to be admitted, because he claims his seat under the same authority by which every member holds the privilege of sitting and voting here, a delegation from the people, their free choice. . . . They are the fountain of this power. We exercise their right. By their representation only we are a House of Parliament. They have a right of choosing for themselves, not a majority here for them.

If you can reject those disagreeable to a majority, the House of Commons will be self-created and self-existing. . . . The consequences of such a principle are dangerous in the extreme. A more forcible engine of despotism cannot be put into the hands of a minister.

Convinced that the Wilkes case influenced the framing of our Constitution, the Court turned next to the drafting debates, where James Madison argued strongly against giving Congress any power to exclude Representatives chosen by the people. He warned that "artificial distinctions may be devised by the stronger in order to keep out partisans of the weaker faction."

What were those artificial distinctions on January 3 that were devised to keep out Rick McIntyre while the gentleman from Idaho, whose election was formally contested, was seated?

The time of day that McIntyre election certificate was issued;

A Member's opinion that Indiana's ballot validation laws are too complicated; and

The false statement—and we all know it to be false—that the McIntyre certificate was based upon a partially completed recount.

Why weren't you told on January 3, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. McIntyre's certificate was issued when—and not until—the secretary of state had received all 15 original and correct county election certificates, and that the McIntyre certificate had nothing to do with the recount?

Why weren't you told on January 3, Mr. Speaker, that a Federal court in Indiana—with a judge appointed by President Carter—had already ruled that there had never been a basis to declare Mr. McCloskey the winner, and that the secretary of state of Indiana had acted lawfully and properly in withholding a certificate until Gibson County corrected its own arithmetic?

Why weren't you reminded on January 3, Mr. Speaker, about the debate right here in this House on the Federal Contested Elections Act? Did you remember the assurance given us—and all Americans—by the manager of the bill? Here it is, Mr. Speaker:

Mr. BLACKBURN. This action would not be construed as changing the present precedents, which are to the effect that the certified winner will take his seat pending the outcome of the contest?

Mr. ABBITT. It does not affect the basic law one iota. It is merely intended to expedite the hearings so that the matter can be brought to a resolution as quickly as possible.

Is this why former Congressman McCloskey did not file a contest in compliance with the Federal Contested Elections Act? Or was it because he had no basis to file?

Speaking of floor debates, a lot of history was made right here in this body relating to Adam Powell on the question of who composes this body, the voters at home or Congress itself. In fact, one of our colleagues thought it was historic enough to write a book about it. It is called "The Powell Affair, Freedom Minus One.'

In the opening pages, the author takes us back to the debate on the original resolution to exclude Mr. Powell.

Where can we Americans who still crave self-Government and liberty find protection today, Mr. Speaker? Can we find it in this body?

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and the gentleman from Indiana who wrote this beautiful book to listen to what the author himself said so persuasively in that same debate:

Mr. Speaker, those who do not study history are ill-equipped to make it. One lesson of history is that those of authority who have made historic decisions on the basis of the emotions of the moment, quite often were the ones who hindered our heritage of freedom . . .

Mr. Speaker, we of this Select Committee . . . found jealous regard in the Constitution for the fundamental right of the people of a congressional district to choose their own representative without permission from the people of any other congressional district; and we found that in this case the better part of wisdom is to preserve a fundamental right of freedom by not setting aside the choice, wise or unwise, of the people of Mr. Powell's district . . .

Mr. Speaker, we concluded that Mr. Powell is not entitled to the things this House has to give . . .

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that the House cannot give, and that is an appointment to represent the people of the 18th district of New York. This is the one office for which no Congress, no governor, only the governed can make a choice.

In my judgment, the better part of wisdom cries out against tinkering with the fundamental right of the people to choose their representative . . .

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we are not holding a popularity contest.

Mr. JACOBS own reflection on article 1, section 5 appears on page 10:

Any high school civics student knows that Article 1 of the United States Constitution provides, "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own members." But surely in a constitutional democracy such a provision could not be interpreted . . . to confer upon a legislative body unlimited power to abrogate a decision by the electorate. Or could it?"

He quotes our beloved colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL]:

Mr. Powell appears before us today with a certificate of election which is just as good as yours or mine. . . . His people said that they wanted him to be their Congressman . . .

I say that this [issue] is about fair play to the people Adam Powell represents. There are 450,000 people—American citizens—in Manhatten who are represented by this man. They have said that they want him to be their Congressman. You might not have made that choice, and I might not have made It. But they want him . . .

I am prepared to let him sit and vote for them until we have a fair hearing . . .

Our colleague author tells us in his book that he was confronted by a young black who asked him, "Do you believe the Congress of the United States is going to apply a double standard * * * with regard to Adam Clayton Powell?" "I hope not," our author answered. "And I must say, I disagree sharply with the action taken on January 10."

Does the gentleman from Indiana disagree then with the action taken on January 3, 1985? Did the Congress of the United States apply a double standard with regard to Rick McIntyre? Will people—American citizens—from the author's own State be denied a voice in Government because of it?

Toward the end of his book, our author quoted extensively from the debate on a later vote to continue excluding Powell. Hear what he wrote about the speech by a member of Madison's "weaker faction," Mr. Wiggins of California:

That every American could find protection in the precedent that we recommended [i.e., seating Powell], was underscored by what Chuck Wiggins said next:

"I might add, Mr. Speaker, that as a member of the minority party, I have good reason to reject the notion that my seat is subject to the whim of the majority of seated members."

□ 1200

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished dean of the Indiana delegation, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the Michel resolution.

The question before us is of the highest significance: Who will represent the people of Indiana's Eighth District in Congress? The answer to that question ought not to be decided on partisan grounds.

On January 3, 1985, the House of Representatives voted to seat neither Mr. McIntyre nor Mr. McCloskey until the Committee on House Administration exercised the House's constitutional power and conducted its own review of the eighth district congressional race.

That was not a radical decision, nor was it unprecedented. We did the fair and reasonable thing to protect the voters of the eighth district, and to preserve the integrity of the House and its constitutional prerogatives.

Let me summarize briefly the reasons for our action on January 3:

First, it was impossible on that date to tell who was the winner of the election. The race was simply too close to call. We could have seated one man or the other, only to unseat him later if the final results showed a new winner. That action indeed would have been radical, and would have served neither the interests of the eighth district residents nor the ideals of regularity and continuity in the electoral process.

Second, it seemed likely on January 3, that the recounts then in progress would do little to help us determine who actually received more votes. The regrettable fact is that the recounts were being conducted under haphazard and inconsistent rules.

Third, article I, section 5 of the U.S. Constitution says that "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members." This was not an election for a State or county position. We were not bound by rules adopted by State or local recount commissions. This was a Federal election, and the Constitution imposed on us the responsibility to conduct our own investigation and reach our own conclusion.

Fourth, our action on January 3 was based squarely on House precedent. I refer to the Roush-Chambers case, which is a clear and controlling precedent. There have been statements that Roush-Chambers is distinguishable and should not apply. Those statements are simply not correct. The record of the Roush-Chambers debate plainly reveals a strikingly similar set of facts. Mr. Chambers was the only claimant to the seat who had a certificate from the Indiana secretary of state. There are repeated references in the debate to the "duly certified Member from Indiana." Yet, because the outcome of the election was still in doubt, the House refused to seat Mr. Chambers notwithstanding his due certification. The precedent of that case is that the House may scrutinize the certificate of election and, under unusual and compelling circumstances, reject it.

Now we are asked to reverse our decision of January 3. But there is no good reason to do so. In fact, the reasons for waiting until the committee has inquired and reported are more compelling than they were a month ago. Consider them briefly:

We still cannot honestly say whether it was Mr. McIntyre of Mr. McCloskey who received more votes on November 6. Even though they have been completed, recounts conducted under 15 different sets of rules, under an Indiana statute that the Republican leadership of the Indiana Senate says is "obsolete" and which the Indiana Legislature is now reforming, should not satisfy us. We do not yet know the winner in this chaotic process which led eventually to the disqualification of nearly 5,000 ballots. And we should not guess.

Some ballots were invalidated in some counties because they did not carry the handwritten initials of poll clerks. In other counties such ballots were counted. Other ballots were thrown out in some counties because they did not have precinct numbers written on them. In other counties such ballots were counted. Still other ballots were canceled merely because of the masking tape on the envelopes in which they were stored. A disproportionate number of all disqualified ballots—about 20 percent—were cast in three predominantly black precincts in the Evansville area.

Ballots were disqualified in nearly every county on the basis of some technical deficiency. There was not even a semblance of uniformity in the application of the disqualifying rules. In case after case after case, ballots were not counted even though they would have been perfectly good had they been cast a few miles away in another county. Such an extraordinary, haphazard, and inconsistent procedure for judging close elections should not be the manner of election to this House, and should not be accepted by this House.

Most of us are not comfortable with any procedure that disenfranchises large numbers of citizens. We are especially uncomfortable when we think that the disenfranchisement may change the outcome of an election. We should not favor election procedures that ignore the clear intent of the voter or otherwise compromise the electoral process.

In my view, there are four guidelines for action that should be recommended to the Committee on House Administration:

First, fair and reasonable recount rules should parallel Indiana law and practice as closely as possible. We should not attempt to get around Indiana law or practice, though we must acknowledge that they are not always clear enough to be determinative.

Second, the rules must be designed to protect against electoral fraud. The authenticity of ballots is basic to the fairness of any election. We must be assured that each ballot was cast properly.

Third, we should do our best to safeguard the voting franchise and respect, whenever reasonably possible, the participation of voters. The recount rules should include every ballot from which the intent of the voter can reasonably be discerned. The House has traditionally applied principles which serve to give effect to the reasonably discernible intentions of the voters. That precedent should be followed here.

Fourth, the rules must be applied uniformly throughout the counties of the eighth district.

I really do not know how the application of such a set of recount rules would affect the outcome of the eighth district race. Partisanship should be no concern of ours in this case. We ought to be worried about the will of the eighth district voters and the integrity of our own actions.

We should permit the Committee on House Administration to discharge its constitutionally mandated function using fair and reasonable rules of uniform application. Accordingly, I urge you to vote against the Michel resolution.

Mr. MICHEL makes three basic arguments to support his resolution to seat Mr. McIntyre. These arguments are:

First, Mr. McIntyre won the election on election night and was properly certified at that time by the secretary of state;

Second, Mr. McIntyre won the election based on the now-completed recounts, and as a result now holds a valid certificate from Indiana;

Third, there is no House precedent for our refusal to seat Mr. McIntyre.

Let me respond briefly to these arguments:

First, Mr. McIntyre did not win the election on election night. The 15 original certificates, submitted by the 15 county clerks to the Indiana secretary of state, gave Mr. McCloskey a 72-vote margin of victory. The Indiana secretary of state, in violation of Indiana statute, refused to certify Mr. McCloskey. His refusal was based on rumors of error in the returns from one county, Gibson. However, there is nothing improper on the face of that return, and there is nothing legally improper in the return. Indiana law (I.C. 3-1-26-9) gives the secretary of state no discretion to reject returns from the county clerks. He is not empowered to act on rumors, but is required to certify the election based on the face of the returns. Those fifteen original documents show McCloskey to be the winner.

Several days after the election, Mr. McIntyre requested that the ballots from Gibson be sealed until they could be examined to determine the source of the discrepancy in the vote totals. The ballots were opened and examined by the Gibson County recount commission. Based upon that recount, the Gibson County clerk issued an amended certification. The secretary of state immediately certified Mr. McIntyre the winner on the basis of the recount in Gibson County alone. The secretary of state subsequently refused to change that certification each time new vote totals produced by recounts in other counties showed Mr. McCloskey to be the winner.

Mr. Michel states that a Federal district court judge upheld the secretary of state's action. In fact, the judge stated that the secretary of state frustrated the processes for resolving the election by failing to certify anyone based on the original returns.

Second, The House should not accept the results produced by the county recounts. The regrettable fact is that 15 different county recount commissions adopted and applied their own sets of rules. There is not the slightest semblance of uniformity from county to county in the way these rules were applied. Ballots disqualified in one county would have been perfectly good had they been cast in another county. The effect of this haphazard application of rules is that nearly 5,000 ballots were disqualified districtwide. Such a procedure is improper for judging elections, and we should not accept it.

Mr. MICHEL and Mr. FRENZEL erroneously contend that Indiana law requires such a hodgepodge of rules. But rules relating to punchcard ballots were applied inconsistently in counties which used punchcards, just as the rules were applied inconsistently in the counties which used paper ballots. Indiana law regarding the distinction between punchcard and paper ballots is confusing in any case. As an example of this confusion, the Indiana General Assembly refused to recognize a distinction between the two types of ballots when it recently judged an election to the Indiana House of Representatives.

Mr. MICHEL himself lists instances in which inconsistent rules were applied. He attributes these inconsistencies to partisan actions designed to disqualify votes for Mr. McIntyre. Inconsistent rules were applied to disqualify votes for both Mr. McIntyre and Mr. McCloskey. The House should not be concerned for whom a disqualified ballot was cast. The House should be concerned with protecting voters. We should attempt to give equal worth to the legitimately cast ballots disqualified to Mr. McIntyre's detriment as we do to the legitimately cast ballots disqualified to Mr. McCloskey's detriment.

Third, our action on January 3 was based squarely on House precedent. There is no meaningful distinction between this case and the Roush-Chambers case. The record of debate in Roush-Chambers plainly reveals a strikingly similar set of facts. The important fact from that case is that Mr. Chambers was the only candidate for the seat who was ever certified by Indiana. There is no mention in the debate of any certificate for Mr. Roush, but there are repeated references to the "duly certified Member of Indiana" (Mr. Chambers). Both Mr. Chambers and Mr. McIntyre were the only claimants who held certificates. Yet the House refused to seat both men until the Committee on House Administration has exercised the House's constitutional power to judge the election, notwithstanding their certificates. In compelling situations, the House may refuse to accept a certification from the State. The haphazard disenfranchisement of 5,000 voters is compelling justification.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY].

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the Republican freshman class of 1984, I am here to point out that appearances are deceiving in the election contest in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District. A member of our class has been certified twice by his State and yet he is being denied his right to join us as a voting Member on the floor of the House of Representatives.

What may appear to be just a case of a contested seat, with both sides putting forth arguments to support the seating of their candidate, goes much deeper than that. Whatever the momentary advantages to the majority, seating the loser on the cynical basis of sheer force will open a Pandora's box of evils on both the Nation and on the entire Congress.

In recent years, individual Members of the Congress have brought disrepute on this body by their private actions. By seating the candidate who got the few votes, the House will now bring itself into disrepute as an institution for a base political motive.

The other party sheds crocodile tears about fairness until they see an advantage in being unfair. For years they have claimed to be the party of electoral reform, except in this body. What the majority party in this House is attempting here is both to play in the game and to referee it.

Can this be the view of the judicial function to serious people? To judge a matter does not involve being a witness. It does not allow creating facts. It certainly does not imply the creation of rules after the game is over.

The majority cannot base its position on the contested election statute. It cannot base its position on the facts. It cannot base its position on the law in Indiana, and of prime importance, it cannot base its position on the vote results in the Eighth District of Indiana. Its sole recourse is to its presumed power in having the votes to force an also-ran into a seat he had not been given by the voters of his district.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the arguments advanced by the minority leader and they were persuasive. I also listened very carefully to SAM HALL. I have a great deal of respect for both of those gentlemen. However, both failed to mention another dimension in this problem which clearly makes it a compelling issue and, therefore, forces the House to do what it must do. It is because of that compelling dimension, I must vote against your motion Mr. MICHEL, and I would urge my other colleagues to do so.

The compelling dimension for me is what appears to be a flagrant, venal violation of civil rights. Now, argue all you want, but that is an issue for me and it ought to be an issue for you if you care about this country.

The reason I raise this issue is that in Vanderburgh County we have seen some strange rules apply. Some of the ballots were rejected because the poll worker initialed them instead of a judge. Some of them were rejected because the poll worker initialed them at one point and later the judge initialed them before taking them to the election board. But the interesting thing is that of the counties involved, of the five precincts involved, two were concentrated in the black areas in the fourth ward. That is where the area of concentration was.

I would assume that there must be action taken by those local black citizens to protect their right to vote. It strains credulity to assume that these different standards were applied in those areas in Vanderburgh County as opposed to other counties where there are not concentrations of black voters.

That is the compelling reason why I think the House must act as it will act. That is the compelling reason why I cannot support Mr. MICHEL's or Mr. HALL's position. We are talking about the most fundamental right in this country, the thing that every President and every Congress and every elected official has urged us to do: Get people to get out and exercise their right to vote.

I suggest to you that anything that trammels or diminishes the right to vote for a given category of people is grossly violative of the principles for which we should stand. So I would urge my colleagues, if for no other issue, to vote for the majority leader's motion on the issue of the compelling problem of civil rights violations.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VANDER JAGT].

Mr. VANDER JAGT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, the essential facts in this case are very simple, straightforward, and undisputed. Complexity and confusion serve the purpose only of those who would obscure the truth, because I honestly believe that when the truth is known and understood, you will vote to seat Rick McIntyre this afternoon, as we should have January 3.

Of course you are partisan Democrats, even as we are partisan Republicans. Of course you would like to protect one of your own and would reach as far as you reasonably can to do so, even as we would.

But I believe—no, I know that you are Americans first, and I believe when the crunch comes and the facts are known, you will subordinate partisanship to two centuries of precedents in this, the greatest deliberative body that the world has ever seen, noted even more for its fairness than its partisanship. I believe that when the crunch comes, you will vote not to sacrifice truth, justice, and fairness on the altar of partisanship, even though you have the votes to do it once the facts are known, because once the facts were known and understood by a county Democratic judge, by a Democratic Federal district judge, and by a bipartisan Indiana Supreme Court, the judges ruled unanimously in favor of Rick McIntyre, rejecting the arguments that have been raised so eloquently here today, and the ruling was upheld that Rick McIntyre was the duly certified winner in the Eighth Congressional District.

Once the facts were known to recount commissioners on the county level, three-fourths of whom were Democrats, Rick McIntyre was the winner of that recount by 415 votes. In fact, in Vanderburgh County there were 2,500 votes disallowed in predominantly blue-collar white precincts, to which McCloskey made no objection before on the same basis there were 1,000 votes disallowed in the black precincts. As a matter of fact, if you put back in every vote that was disallowed in the recount by counties, 11 out of 15 which were Democratic, McIntyre wins by 34 votes.

No matter how partisan you are, you cannot escape four undisputed simple facts. First, on election night results, Rick McIntyre was the winner.

Fact No. 2: On the basis of completed and corrected totals from the counties, all of them certified to the secretary of state as complete and correct, McIntyre was the winner and was so certified.

Fact No. 3: On the basis of the recount, McIntyre is the winner by 450 votes.

And fact No. 4: For two centuries, in 82 out of 82 cases, when there was a disputed election, the individual who had the due certificate of election from that State was seated pending the resolution of the controversy or of the recount.

Now, the case has been made that there is one exception, and in that exception from Indiana there were two people who showed up, each of them had a certificate of election, and the House wisely said, "You both stand aside until we can figure out which has the valid certificate of election from that State."

It is a little bit like an umpire in a baseball game calling "Strike three, you're out." No matter how much you might disagree with the call on that pitch, it stands because the umpire is duly authorized to make that call. Now, in elections, unlike in baseball game, there is an appeals process called recount or referral to the House Administration Committee, and that is fine. But the original call by the duly authorized umpire or official of that State stands until such time as there is an overwhelming case to reverse that original decision, a case beyond on testimony, not press releases, on evidence taken under oath, not on charges and claims.

It seems to me that we have a clear-cut case here of whether or not we are going to undo a mistake that was made on January 3 when, for the first time in two centuries, we refused to seat a duly authorized winner.

The majority made the case on January 3 that "We can't seat him because there is a recount that is in process, and it would be premature," and the argument was made very persuasively that we ought to wait until the recount is over. The recount is over, the final count is in, and McIntyre is an even bigger winner. That excuse is gone.

Mr. Speaker, let us seat him as we should do under the Constitution.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, first I would like to correct the first fact of my friend, the gentleman from Michigan, that on election night the Republican candidate was declared the winner. The fact——

Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Of course not. I only have 2 minutes.

Mr. VANDER JAGT. You just made a misstatement of fact as to what I said. Could I correct it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS] controls the time.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, is this the same gentleman who was calling for fairness? I only have 2 minutes.

The fact is that 15 counties certified their votes and Mr. McCloskey was the winner by 72 votes. The fact is that the Republican secretary of state——

Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, could I have regular order, please? I did not badger the gentleman from Michigan when he was stating his facts.

The fact is that the secretary of state waited until a correction was made in one county before certifying. The fact further is that he certified before the recount was done.

Another fact is that in the Indiana State Legislature right now there is a contested election, and in that contested election the House of Representatives has thrown out the very rules on which this recount relied and counted all the votes and seated the Republican by a majority of Republican votes in the State house of representatives.

The other fact is about Powell versus McCormack. I have great affection for the gentleman from Texas, and I am sure the error was unintentional, but Powell versus McCormack turned on whether the House of Representatives, by a simple majority vote, could refuse to seat a person whose votes were not in contest, whose citizenship of the State from which he was elected was not in contest, and whose citizenship of the United States for 7 years, as provided by the Constitution, was not in controversy. The controversy was whether he was a good guy or a bad guy, and the U.S. Supreme Court held that the House of Representatives by a simple majority vote could not make that judgment, they would have to do it by a two-thirds vote. The only judgment they could make by a simple majority vote would be who got the most votes and whether the person was qualified in the other two respects I mentioned.

Let me finally say this, Mr. Speaker: I have been disillusioned today. I have always had a profound respect for my Republican friends and their cold efficiency, if nothing else, and to think that they would have to disenfranchise 5,000 of my fellow Hoosiers in order for their man to win by only 400 votes is disillusioning.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to take the well as a member of the task force charged under House Resolution 1 to get to the bottom of this election question in Indiana's Eighth District.

On January 3, a prudent person could well have taken a wait-and-see attitude and said, "Give Indiana the benefit of the doubt, let them recount, don't seat anyone for the time being." today that process is behind us. Indiana has recounted. Today the prudent choice is to seat Mr. McIntyre conditionally pending the outcome of the task force's investigation, which for me will be guided by a requirement that the political chips will fall where they may.

Mr. Speaker, for me, my personal integrity, this institution's integrity and my oath of office are at stake. If we seat Mr. McIntyre conditionally, this House loses nothing. Our power is absolute in this area. But when you exercise absolute power, you should be absolutely sure.

By voting not to seat today, you repudiate Indiana's recount statutes; you repudiate the citizens of Indiana, white and black, Republican and Democrat, who participated in that recount procedure; you condemn them without a hearing; you reject Indiana's efforts as unfair, corrupt, biased, or prejudiced without letting them present their case.

This is what the task force is supposed to do and will do. Let us examine the facts in an orderly forum under an orderly process. Would you want anything less for your State and your people?

If you know that the election and the recount in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District was so flawed by design or accident as to be repudiated now on this floor, then vote no to seat. But if you do not know with absolute certainty, if you think that an orderly investigation of the facts, at no risk to this institution and its powers, is the very minimum that you would want for your State and your people, then you must vote to seat Mr. McIntyre.

□ 1230

Seat Mr. McIntyre conditionally and let those of us narrowly charged with the awesome duty of protecting our free and fair vote do so in a forum where everyone's rights can be fully exercised. A vote to seat protects all of us. A vote not to seat puts us all at risk individually, institutionally and constitutionally. When you vote, ask yourself, are you absolutely sure.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I am outraged by the disenfranchisement of 5,000 black voters in Indiana during the Indiana election under discussion today. These uncounted votes came from three to four election precincts which were predominantly black. It is obvious which candidate would have gained these votes. Thus, it is equally obvious which party was responsible for not counting them.

I believe that this act of disenfranchisement is more important than even the final disposition of the House seat in question. For it does not matter who serves in Congress if all the people are not permitted their constitutional right to vote.

I am particularly angered by the fact that black votes were singled out as the ones that did not count. This has happened so many times in our history—yet I refuse to accept this injustice.

At best, the inconsistent and contradictory standards applied by some of the 15 counties in the recount were the result of inadvertant mistakes on the part of election officials. At worst, they are a blatant attempt on the part of the Republicans to steal the election.

If House Democrats wanted to be partisan, they could have seated Frank McCloskey on January 3 on the basis of his winning margin on election night. We did not do that. Instead, we referred the matter to the House Administration Committee.

In doing so, the House has simply fulfilled its constitutional responsibility to judge the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. The House is not imposing any additional qualifications on its Members, and is therefore in compliance with the Supreme Court's rulings on this matter.

Instead by referring this matter to committee, the House is attempting to make certain that the election procedures were fair and that the candidate receiving the most votes is seated. I have complete faith that the House Administration Committee will act with speed and integrity to decide which candidate in this contested election actually received the most votes.

Have we returned to the days of poll taxes, property requirements for voting, and other ruses to keep the black community's voice from being heard? Are we back again at the days of Jim Crow?

No, we are not returning to the methods of the past but, just the same, I fear we are going back to the discrimination that has so colored voting rights in this Nation.

Haven't we learned that we cannot take away any citizen's vote without threatening every citizen's vote? If Indiana throws out black votes today, who can predict what State will throw out the votes of another group in the next election.

This is truly a frightening precedent that the vote counters in Indiana set back on November 6, 1984. It will not go unnoticed or unchallenged. Black and all other voters will not be disenfranchised for anybody's political advantage.

Listening to this debate, I am greatly disturbed by this unjust attempt to deny Representative McCloskey his seat in Congress. It is the Republicans, not the Democrats, who are distorting the election results and recount process for partisan advantage.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE].

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, we must act as judges rather than as partisans in this case. That is why I called up BOB MICHEL's office and said, "Send me every piece of information you have on this case so I can sit as a judge rather than as a partisan."

There is one issue, and it is not whether we should seat Mr. McIntyre permanently, but whether we should seat him temporarily, and I understand that.

It is my judgment we ought not to. There are precedents going each way, precedents where we have seated individuals temporarily and where we have not.

What are the deciding factors in this case which should lead us not to seat him? I think two.

First of all, the certification in question that we are dealing with, except that Mr. McIntyre won by about 400 votes or so, came after this House voted to give jurisdiction on the issue to the House Administration Committee, and I do not think we should be backtracking.

Second, it is the nature of Indiana's law and practices. The fact of the matter is that they do have approximately 15 different standards. Given the conjunction of those two circumstances that we already assumed jurisdiction prior to this certification and the fact that they used 15 different sets of standards in determining the merit of the various ballots chosen, we ought not to seat temporarily. We ought to wait until the House Administration Committee judiciously renders its final nonpartisan decision.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the minority in this House is accustomed to being kicked around by majority Democrats. In the more than 14 years I've been here, that's been the rule in everything we do.

Republicans who make up 42 percent of the House get only about 20 percent of its committee staff. The majority Democrat caucus has demanded extraordinary majorities on all committees. At one time they required a 2-to-1-plus-1 ratio on conference committees. That meant Republicans who never had less than 35 percent of the House frequently had less than 25 percent representation on conference committees.

This session, the committee ratios have been improved, but the most important committees, Ways and Means, Appropriations, and Rules still have indefensible, distorted committee ratios designed to cheat Republicans out of whatever modest victories they have won in the last election. Yesterday the minority on Judiciary Committee had to walk out of committee to dramatize the spiteful 2-to-1-plus-1 ratio on subcommittees.

Our House procedures are slanted to keep the minority suppressed. Probably alone among parliamentary bodies, the House allows its committees to do business with less than a 50-percent quorum. The minority's right to demand a quorum on the floor has been substantially reduced.

When minority amendments to appropriations bills were occasionally being passed, majority Democrats made such amendments out of order. When other Republican amendments looked attractive, the majority used its 2-to-1-plus-1 majority on the Rules Committee to pass rules foreclosing debate and limiting amendments.

These abuses of majority control are just the way things are here. Most Democrats don't even think about it. They think the minority was created to be abused by the majority. They don't think of their conduct as abusive. They think it is the natural order.

Against this historical background of suppression comes the McIntyre case. I suspect most Members don't know much about it. Democrats who don't understand the facts and fundamentals did, and may again, simply blindly follow their leadership in the mistaken notion that this is just another opportunity to slap down the minority.

But this isn't just another case. It is the ultimate abuse of representative government in our Republic. A member-elect of this House, duly elected and certified under State laws of Indiana—then duly recertified and reaffirmed by a careful recount process under a recent State law—has been denied his seat.

His constituents have been abused and insulted. The State of Indiana has been abused and insulted. This House has been degraded. The Constitution has been defiled.

And to what purpose? Plain and simple, it is to steal an election. The purpose is to take unlawfully a seat in Congress from a Republican who won it, so that the seat can be given to a Democrat who lost the election.

On January 3, I called this a naked abuse of power by an arrogant, ruthless majority. After the completion of the recount, the majority leader's motion seems to make that description a timid one.

Make no mistake about it. That was no procedural vote on January 3. This is no simple procedural vote today, nor is it a little partisan kick at the minority to keep it from acting uppity. It's a supervote, a blockbuster.

It's a vote where each of you can sustain, or overturn, an atrocity, a rape of our fundamental theory of elective government. The vote on January 3 was unprecedented. The new precedent the House set then puts every seat in every State where the election was close in jeopardy.

That vote pitted the House majority Democrats against the people of Indiana, the State of Indiana, and against the very foundations of this Republic. The people, the State, and the Republic lost.

When historians write about this case, it will probably be subtitled, "The House versus the State of Indiana." But, after this precedent, it could be any State, mine or yours. In my judgment, this case should be titled, "House Democrats versus Elective Government."

On January 3 I gave some examples why this case differed markedly from the Roush case. I repeat them now for the record: First, there is a clear certificated winner here; second, there is no question about who won; third, there are no allegations of fraud; fourth, there has been no contest filed under our FCEA; fifth, there is a modern recount law and it has affirmed the McIntyre victory; sixth, the House now has a FCEA.

Derchler's precedents clearly identifies the Roush case (ch. 8-16.2) as one where a certificate of election was contradicted. If anyone believes the Roush case is a reasonable precedent, it can only mean they have not studied either case, or the events which occurred in between.

No amount of partisan sophistry can erode the fact that Congressman-elect McIntyre was elected on November 6—that he received an election certificated from the State of Indiana—and that he should be seated. No other Member of this House has been denied a seat when the certification process has been clear and unchallenged.

Then came the clincher. On February 5 this House was officially notified that a recount, under the laws of the State of Indiana, supervised by judges in each of the 15 counties, conducted by recount commissioners chosen by the courts, has been completed. The secretary of state writes that the recount reaffirms the earlier certification of Congressman-elect McIntyre.

During the debate on January 3, proponents of the resolution to deny McIntyre his seat, said the situation was confused because a recount was in process. I wasn't a bit confused. But, if any other Member was, there ought to be no need for confusion now after the recount.

Having lost the election, having lost the attempt to confuse the election result by claiming victory before corrected county returns were filed, and having lost the recount, election stealers are, of course, still trying to spread more confusion.

They say Republicans controlled and subverted the recount in nefarious ways. That doesn't wash because the county judges appoint recount commissioners. In Vanderburgh County, in which most changes were made in the recount, and in which McCloskey forces allege shennanigans, the Democrat county judge selected 2 Democrats and 1 Republican as recount commissioners.

The most aggressive Democrat commissioner there insisted on strict compliance with Indiana law. Hundreds of ballots, particularly absentee ballots for McIntyre, were declared invalid without a peep out of the McCloskey forces. Later, when several hundred ballots in black precincts were invalidated because the law requires punch card ballots to carry precinct numbers, the McCloskey forces wailed that Republicans had done something wrong.

The problem here is that everytime the McCloskey crowd cries foul, its allegations are promptly refuted, but it then promptly raises another specious complaint. That's ridiculous. The burden of proof is not on McIntyre. He was elected. He was certified.

The burden of proof is on the loser. The loser has only blown smoke. He has not put forward convincing proof that the McIntyre certificate and reaffirmation is flawed. He lost first in the election, then in court, and then in the recount. The only place he can win is in this House, and only then if the House majority Democrats are shameless enough to declare a loser the winner.

The district court's response to McCloskey is instructive here. The court said if it looked at all the county reports, McCloskey loses. If it looked at the Gibson recount, he loses. His remedy lies in the Federal Contested Elections Act.

Despite what the court told him, McCloskey did not file a contest under that act. He did not do it because he had no case. Instead, he is now trying to frustrate that act by appealing to his friends in the House majority. The only way he can succeed—through confusion.

It's hard to be unemotional, dispassionate, and calm while being mugged. If I sound emotional, it is because I am. This is not garden variety, minor league suppression of the minority. This is not run-of-the-mill partisan game playing. This is murder.

If you don't understand this vote, please find someone who can explain it to you. Some of you are going to be terribly embarrassed, and not just by the lawsuits that will inevitably follow a vote to deny again the seat legally won by Richard McIntyre.

Please think about what representative government means. Then vote to seat this lawfully elected Congressman.●

● Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, in reviewing House precedents, I went back to volume one of Hinds' Precedents which was published in 1907. There you will find in chapter 18 case after case after case in which the precedent is upheld, and I quote, that "The House admits on his prima facie showing and without regard to final right, a Member-elect from a recognized constituency whose credentials are in due form and whose qualifications are unquestioned."

But in reading over those earlier cases, the more human and institutional aspect of this precedent was brought home in the debates of those who have preceded us in this Chamber. Perhaps the most compelling case was an 1871 challenge in which someone objected to the seating of a minority party Member, even though his credentials were in order. A Member of the majority party, Congressman Dawes of Massachusetts, who served on the elections committee, rose in the well to defend the temporary right of his challenged minority party Member to a seat. To quote from Congressman Dawes' remarks:

Sir, I, as the organ of the Committee on Elections for twelve years, have time and again so stated . . . that the certificate of a Member, where there was no allegation against his eligibility, of his lack of loyalty, or other ineligibility, entitled him to be sworn in.

Mr. Dawes went on, and again I quote:

It has been the struggle during all these disturbed times of that Committee on Elections to hold to the precedents and to the law against passion and against prejudice, so that if the party should ever fall into a minority, they should have no precedent of their own making to be brought up against them to their own great injury.

My colleagues, what are we doing here? What about the constitutional right of the people of the Eighth District of Indiana, to have a representative in the body? Where will it end? Will winners of close elections summarily not be seated if he or she is of the wrong party? Will it eventually extend to positions taken in campaigns, or primary results? Mr. Speaker, it is wrong not to seat Congressman-elect McIntyre.

And Mr. Dawes concluded his remarks by beseeching his majority party colleagues, and I qoute:

Now, with nothing to be gained, but with everything to be lost, by the precedent now sought to be established, I entreat the House to adhere to the ancient rule.

Mr. Dawes prevailed in that instance as the House voted 42-147 against the motion not to seat the challenged Member.●

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remaining time.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be allowed 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the item of business presently under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not time to do everything. First let us talk about the 5,000 invalidated votes that Republicans stole; 96 percent of the invalidated votes in the recount were done by a recount commission appointed with 2-to-1 Democrats, by a Democrat judge, hardly a Republican shenanigan.

With respect to the allegation of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] that there are different rules, of course there are different rules. If the gentleman knew his own State law he would know they have rules for paper ballots, punchcards, and machines. Six counties were on punchcards, six were on machines, and three on paper ballots. Of course they were different.

With respect to the disenfranchisement of black voters, the judge, the Democrat judge, instructed the 2-to-1 recount commissioners on Indiana law and on the Supreme Court decisions which related to it.

Punchcards, when they do not have anything on them other than a punch in Indiana have got to be thrown out. That law was followed scrupulously.

Finally let me say that all these items are smoke being blown over the problem by the McCloskey forces. McIntyre has no burden of proof. He won. McCloskey has the burden of proof. He lost the election. He lost in district court and he lost the recount. The only way McCloskey can win is if he confuses his cronies so that they violate the laws of the United States and the State of Indiana and vote him into the Congress.

This is not a procedural vote. It is not a vote on the integrity of any committee. It is not the usual political squabble. It is not just Democrats picking on Republicans so the suppressed minority will not get uppity.

This is a blockbuster vote. This is murder. This is a rape of a system. The issue is the ultimate abuse of representative government. We have an elected, certified Member.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield to the gentleman. Was he making a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would probably understand, as does the gentleman, what the gentleman from Texas was doing. He was questioning whether the words should be taken down or not. But no point of order was made.

The gentleman from Minnesota will continue.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Speaker if I might get an appropriate amount of time extra, as the gentleman from Texas did?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will continue.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the Speaker. If I may continue.

The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman from Texas are not taken out of the time of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, an elected certified Member of Congress whose certification has been reaffirmed by a recount under the appropriate State law has been voted once in an atrocity perpetrated by this House not to take the seat which he himself won. If we reaffirm that outrage today we are bringing further shame upon the House.

I would ask, I would beg, I would implore every Member of the House to look at the facts. Forget about your partisan inclinations. Think about what representative government means to you. Think about what your constituents think when they cast a vote for you or for your opponent in an election.

Having completed that meditation, I would respectfully request and suggest that every Member of this House vote down the motion to refer and to vote to seat Rick McIntyre, the rightful winner in Indiana's Eighth District election.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, there has been a veritable rhetorical orgy attempting to portray what is being done here today and what was done on January 3 as the theft of an election or as some surreptitious attempt to seat a Democrat because he is a Democrat. Let us get it real clear.

We are not trying to seat anybody today. We are trying to allow the orderly procedures of the House to be followed. This House voted on January 3 that the matter should be referred to the House Committee on Administration. It was so referred.

Now, lest anybody think that committee, which has an unblemished record for nonpartisanship, plans any delays in its findings, I want to yield to the chairman of that committee or to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] who is a member of that committee to give us assurances that it intends to act and report back if possible within 45 days.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield for that purpose, I do.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman knows, in an earlier statement I have instructed this task force to move as quickly as possible toward a resolution of this unfortunate situation. As chairman of the full committee, I have already consulted with the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], our colleague, who is chairman of the task force, and I have asked him not only to move as quickly as possible toward a resolution of this problem, but to complete its work within 45 days on or before April 30.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for that assurance.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will yield to the gentleman who is the chairman of the subcommittee.

□ 1240

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not yield for that purpose, Mr. Speaker. I have already yielded to the gentleman from California who is chairman of the task force investigating this election contest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will kindly stand at the microphone and be on his feet.

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I had not intended to speak on this issue because I have the responsibility on the task force to look at this issue. I consider this one of the most serious responsibilities that I have assumed since becoming a Member of this institution.

It is my approach that this matter will be handled expeditiously and on a bipartisan basis because we do have to set common procedures and determine the vote.

I am in concurrence with the chairman and have indicated to the chairman that it is our intent that within 45 days to attempt to report back to the House, assuming that we have cooperation within the task force.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman for that statement.

Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself in the few remaining moments to the questions that have been raised.

First is a statement on the part of the minority that somehow we are breaking precedent. That, of course, is not true. It is not the first time we have refused to seat either claimant, notwithstanding the possession by one of a certificate.

In 1961, in the contest between Roush and Chambers, it was stated clearly on the House floor by the then minority leader, Mr. Halleck from Indiana, that Mr. Chambers has a certificate of election from the State of Indiana and should be seated. In that case the House wisely chose to seat neither Mr. Chambers and Mr. Roush, and pursuant to the inquiry and the counting of all of the votes, Mr. Roush was declared the due winner.

Citing Deschler's Precedents:

Thus the adoption of House Resolution 1 automatically nullified the certificate of election which had been issued by the Governor of Indiana.

Further citing Deschler's Precedents, and I think this is vital:

Although the House of Representatives generally follows State law and the rulings of State courts in resolving election contests, this is not necessarily so with respect to the validity of ballots where the intention of the voter is clear and there is no evidence of fraud.

What is at issue here today is the insistence of the House Administration Committee that all ballots of all qualified voters—Republican, Democrat, or what have you—shall be counted. That is a sacred right.

This is an unusual case. More than 5,000 voters were systematically disenfranchised upon often flimsy technicalities. Now, is it not important that those 5,000 voters shall have their ballots counted? I do not know who the winner will be. I do not think members of the committee know who the winner will be.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VANDER JAGT] has asserted that if all of the ballots are counted then Mr. McIntyre will be the winner. If that is the case, so be it. But let us have the ballots counted. That is the most sacred thing available in this democracy of ours.

Let me cite some more precedents from law, the very State of Indiana itself. The Indiana Supreme Court has held that a precinct clerk's initials do not need to be inscribed on a ballot; yet many of these uncounted ballots were disallowed on that ground. The Indiana State Legislature, acting very recently, overruled an earlier local election commission ruling in another contest. The legislature held that strict adherence to this requirement was unfair to the voters.

These people have been disenfranchised through no fault of their own, Mr. Speaker. I should like to recite the precedent in Moss versus Rhea, which held in another case that the failure of the clerks to initial the ballots was a mistake of which the voter himself was not a participant, and that the ballots should be counted.

Further, from McCrary, a Treatise on the Law of Elections, 1897:

Acts of election officials are merely directory and the voter will not be disenfranchised for failure of these officials to perform their duty.

Further, in the case of Taylor versus England, 6 Cannon's Precedents, and this is a critical case:

The House of Representatives should not consider itself obligated to follow the drastic statute of the State of West Virginia, another instance of another State, under the provisions of which all ballots not personally signed by the clerks of election in strict compliance with the manner prescribed had been rejected, but should retain the discretionary right to follow the rules of endeavoring to discover the clear intention of the voter.

That is what is sacred. That is what is at issue. The intent of the voter, and his or her right to be counted.

If we declare a winner today before those votes have been counted, then we will be ratifying decisions which disenfranchised more the 5,000 Indiana voters.

No question has been raised so far as I am able to discern, but that those voters were qualified voters. No question has arisen alleging fraud. The voters came to the polls. They voted. Thousands of their votes were disallowed. That is the question which requires a committee investigation and findings.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to refer.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, my inquiry is will the Speaker protect my request to strike the intrusion into my discussion by the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], under Deschler's Precedents, and this is volume 8, section 24.65, which says that—

A Member desiring to interrupt another in debate should address the Chair for permission. If the Member having the floor declines to yield, he may strike from the record.

The SPEAKER. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], which were not a point of order in view of the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] had the time and did not yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] will not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The Clerk will report the motion to refer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on House Administration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to refer offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 221, nays 180, answered "present" 1, not voting 30, as follows:

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT AS ADDITIONAL MEMBERS OF PERMANENT SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to clause 6(f), rule X, and clause 1, rule XLVIII, the Chair appoints as additional members of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, the following Members of the House:

Mr. STUMP of Arizona;
Mr. IRELAND of Florida;
Mr. HYDE of Illinois;
Mr. CHENEY of Wyoming;
Mr. LIVINGSTON of Louisiana, and
Mr. MCEWEN of Ohio.

OMNIBUS INTELLIGENCE AND SECURITY IMPROVEMENTS ACT

(Mr. STUMP asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced the Omnibus Intelligence and Security Improvements Act, a bill to improve our ability to conduct intelligence activities and to protect national security secrets. The bill consists of 10 titles, each making specific changes in the law to improve the security of the United States.

In the past 4 years, under the leadership of President Reagan, Congress has shouldered the responsibility of enacting legislation to improve the security of the Nation, including the Intelligence Agency Information Act. In addition, a considerable number of administrative authorities for intelligence agencies were enacted, contributing greatly to the security and efficiency of U.S. intelligence activities. The Congress has also approved substantial increases in funds requested by the President for intelligence and counterintelligence activities.

A great deal has been accomplished, but a great deal more remains to be done. Congress must act to improve even further the ability of this country to ensure its security, consistent, as always, with our fundamental beliefs and principles.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced the Omnibus Intelligence and Security Improvements Act as the first step, by this Congress, toward building on the improvements made in our Nation's security over recent years. I urge my colleagues to examine the bill carefully, and to support its enactment.

A summary of the bill follows:

OMINBUS INTELLIGENCE AND SECURITY IMPROVEMENT ACT—SUMMARY

TITLE I—RECURRING INTELLIGENCE AUTHORIZATION PROVISIONS CODIFICATION ACT

Title I of the bill codifies as permanent law a provision which has been included in past fiscal years in the intelligence authorization acts. The provision ensures notification to appropriate committees of Congress of expenditures by U.S. intelligence agencies in excess of program authorizations. Placing the provision permanently in the National Security Act of 1947 avoids the potential problem of lapse of the provision between the end of a fiscal year and the enactment of an intelligence authorization act for the following fiscal year.

TITLE II—INTELLIGENCE OR LAW ENFORCEMENT DEFENSE PRETRIAL NOTIFICATION ACT

Title II of the bill amends the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to require a defendant to give notice prior to trial if he intends to claim in his defense that he was, or believed he was, acting on behalf of a federal law enforcement or intelligence agency at the time of the alleged offense. In recent years, the number of cases in which defendants have falsely claimed at trial to have been working secretly for a U.S. intelligence or law enforcement agency has increased dramatically. Title II of the bill would eliminate the element of surprise and allow for a full and fair trial of such claims.

TITLE III—FOREIGN COUNTERINTELLIGENCE INVESTIGATION IMPROVEMENTS ACT

Title III of the bill will improve the ability of the United States to defend itself against espionage by the agents of hostile foreign powers. Title III amends the Right to Financial Privacy Act to improve Federal Bureau of Investigation access to bank records for counterintelligence investigations. Title III also amends the Internal Revenue Code to give the FBI access to the tax return and return information of agents of foreign powers. Finally, Title III amends the State Department Basic Authorities Act to ensure that travel within the United States by foreign diplomatic personnel to high technology areas is clearly consistent with U.S. national security.

TITLE IV—FEDERAL EMPLOYEE UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION ACT

Title VI of the bill amends title 18 of the United States Code to establish as a federal crime the intentional unauthorized disclosure of classified information by a federal employee. Currently, such disclosures are per se criminal offenses only if the classified information concerns communications intelligence and cryptographic information, the identities of covert U.S. intelligence agents, or atomic energy restricted data. Title VI will establish criminal penalties for unauthorized disclosure of the other types of information whose disclosure can reasonably be expected to cause damage to the national security. By virtue of Title VI, disclosure of U.S. national security secrets by U.S. personnel, who have voluntarily assumed positions of high national trust, would be subject to criminal penalties.

TITLE V—FEDERAL POLYGRAPH AND PREPUBLICATION REVIEW LIMITATION ACT

Title V of the bill would regulate the use of polygraph examinations and prepublication review requirements by the United States government with respect to federal employees. The legislation restricts substantially the use of these security techniques, while carefully preserving their use in sensitive intelligence, security and special access programs and, in certain circumstances, in law enforcement investigations.

TITLE VI—ESPIONAGE AND TREASON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT PROCEDURES ACT

Title VI of the bill amends title 18 of the United States Code to establish constitutional procedures to implement the existing death penalty provisions of statutes punishing espionage and treason. In 1972, the Supreme Court struck down the application of the death penalty because of the way in which it was applied. Title VI of the bill will provide constitutional procedures to permit imposition of the death sentence in appropriate cases for espionage and treason.

Title VI provides for a separate sentencing hearing, after conviction for espionage or treason, to determine whether to impose a sentence of death. The jury, or, if the defendant and the government so agree, the judge, will consider a number of mitigating and aggravating factors to determine whether, in the particular facts and circumstances of the case, the death sentence is warranted. Title VI also provides expedited procedures for appellate court review of a sentence of death.

TITLE VII—FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE SOURCE IMPROVEMENT ACT

Title VII of the bill amends the Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949 to permit the President to naturalize a maximum of five persons per year admitted to the United States for permanent residence under the existing provisions of the CIA Act because of their critical contributions to the security of the United States. Title VII would enable the United States to use the potential for U.S. citizenship as a strong inducement to highly placed individuals in hostile foreign countries to become U.S. intelligence sources.

TITLE VIII—INTELLIGENCE IDENTITIES PROTECTION-RELATED AMENDMENTS

Title VIII of the bill amends the existing provision of title 5 of the United States Code which terminates the federal annuity benefits of a federal employee convicted of certain national security crimes. Title VIII would include offenses under section 601 of the National Security Act of 1947, which prohibits disclosure of the identities of covert U.S. intelligence agents, among those annuity-disqualifying crimes.

Title VIII also amends chapter 119 of title 18 of the United States Code, which, among other things, provides for court orders for interception of wire and oral communications in investigations of certain national security crimes. Title VII would include offenses under section 601 of the National Security Act of 1947, which prohibits disclosure of the identities of covert U.S. intelligence agents, among those crimes for which such interception orders could be obtained.

TITLE IX—FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE SURVEILLANCE AMENDMENTS

Title IX amends the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) to extend from twenty-four hours to forty-eight hours the period during which emergency foreign intelligence electronic surveillances may be conducted on the authority of the Attorney General. Title IX also amends the FISA to permit retention and dissemination of communications constituting threats of death or serious bodily harm incidentally overheard while conducting electronic testing, training or security countermeasures in accordance with the FISA. Finally, Title IX clarifies the relationship between the authority of the government to conduct law enforcement surveillances under chapter 119 of title 18 of the United States Code and its authority to conduct foreign intelligence electronic surveillances under the FISA, by making clear that the government may proceed under either authority when both apply.

TITLE X—CONGRESSIONAL SECURITY SURVEY ACT

Title X provides for a comprehensive survey of the personnel, physical, document and communications security programs relating to classified information possessed by the legislative branch. Title IX requires the Director of the FBI to conduct the survey under the guidance of congressional leadership and to report to the leadership by January 3, 1986 with recommendations for improvement of the security of classified information in the legislative branch.

OBSERVERS TO THE START TALKS

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker has named the Democratic House Members who will be observers at the START talks in Geneva.

I'm prepared to name the House Republicans who will be members of that observation team.

But before I do, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate President Reagan on his masterful handling of the arms control situation.

President Reagan has gone about this delicate task in exactly the right way. If he had listened to some of his critics, he would have made concessions to the Soviets hoping to get the Soviets back to the table after they walked away.

But he knew concessions are seen by the Soviets as weakness. So he quite wisely refrained from panicking and making unilateral concessions.

The President did not back off emplacing Pershing missiles in Europe to counter the Soviet SS-20's. But he didn't close the door to further negotiations.

The President's approach to arms control has been one of the major diplomatic success stories in post-war history.

The Soviet Union walked from the table vowing never to return.

They have returned. They are finally ready to seriously talk.

Only President Reagan's combination of firmness and flexibility could have brought these talks to this stage.

It is high time his critics publicly admit that his overall performance in this area has been excellent.

Having said that, let me now name the Republican Members to the Geneva observation team:

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT], the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER], and the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

NATIONAL DECA WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 36) to designate the week of February 10, 1985, through February 16, 1985, as "National DECA Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I would like to thank the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services, for his assistance in bringing this commemorative measure to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I support the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 36, to designate the week of February 10–16, 1985, as "National DECA Week".

DECA, the Distributive Education Clubs of America, are found in each of the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. The superb work done by DECA with thousands of young people throughout the country richly deserves this recognition. I was very pleased to offer this resolution in the House, and I hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that DECA is making an indispensable contribution to the improvement of our educational system through the example they provide in vocational understanding, civic consciousness, social intelligence, and leadership development. Through professional conferences, chapter activities, school improvement projects, and support of community activities, DECA strives to ensure that America will continue to have entrepreneurs and business persons in community leadership positions.

As a member of the DECA congressional advisory board, I would like to thank my colleagues for their support of this measure as cosponsors and to the majority leader for his assistance in expediting consideration of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was not objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution as follows:

S.J. RES. 36

Whereas members of the Distributive Education Clubs of America are playing an outstanding role in assuring the future progress and prosperity of our Nation;

Whereas it is vital in our complex society that young people trained in the field of marketing and distribution to fill the increased demand for such people;

Whereas the members of the Distributive Education Clubs of America, are young secondary and postsecondary students who are preparing for careers in marketing and distribution, and the intense interest shown by such members is an assurance that the business world will grow and improve; and

Whereas marketing and distributive education has provided the valuable service of developing leadership, encouraging cooperation, promoting good citizenship, teaching current information, and inspiring patriotism among its members: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of February 10, 1985, through February 16, 1985, is designated as "National DECA Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON OCCUPANT RESTRAINT INFORMATION PROGRAM

(Mr. LEHMAN of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as many of my colleagues know, Transportation Secretary Dole issued a new automobile passive restraint regulation last July. That rule requires automakers to install airbags, automatic seatbelts, or crash proof interiors in newly manufactured cars according to a phased schedule beginning in 1986. However, Secretary Dole left a major loophole in this requirement. If States representing two-thirds of the U.S. population pass mandatory seatbelt use laws by April 1, 1989, this rule would be automatically rescinded. That loophole is very controversial in the highway safety community and will be the subject of congressional and judicial review.

Another important feature of Secretary Dole's decision, with which I am most directly concerned as chairman of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, is a proposal to spend $80 million over 4 years for a national program "to encourage safety belt use and mandatory usage laws". This significant new program was announced along with the new rule in July, 5 months after the fiscal year 1985 budget was submitted, and 2 months after appropriation hearings on that budget were concluded.

However, in view of the potential benefits of such a program, $10 million was provided in the fiscal year 1985 continuing resolution. The continuing resolution conferees agreed that this appropriation was not to be construed as giving the congressional go-ahead for this program. Its purpose was simply to allow the Department to proceed in developing the necessary program plans and justifications and to allow the Department to begin this program expeditiously if congressional approval was ultimately granted. Specifically, the conferees required that no more than $2.5 million of the $10 million could be obligated prior to further approval from the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, and that those funds could be used only for planning purposes. That intent was to prohibit actual program implementation until the Department justified this program to Congress in upcoming budget hearings this spring.

Subsequently, in response to a December request from Secretary Dole to remove these restrictions prior to any congressional hearings, the House and Senate Appropriations Committees agreed to allow the Department to spend that $2.5 million for certain relatively noncontroversial educational purposes. However, both committees reiterated the view that justification hearings needed to be held before they would consider releasing the remaining $7.5 million.

In addition to the $10 million already provided, the President's budget requests an additional $10 million as a fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriation, and $20 million for fiscal year 1986.

With this in mind, I am taking this opportunity to announce that the Subcommittee on Transportation Appropriations will hold a 1-day hearing devoted solely to this program on February 26, 1985, in room 2358 of the Rayburn House Office Building. In view of the keen interest in this program, the subcommittee will depart from its regular hearing procedure and invite interested Members of Congress and outside witnesses to testify. A Department of Transportation witness will also be invited to testify.

Those wishing to testify should write to me in care of the House Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, 2358 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC 20515. Subcommittee staff will contact those requesters in the week prior to the hearing to schedule specific appearance times. Written statements will also be accepted for the record if received by February 26. Testimony should be limited to 10 minutes.

Testimony from witnesses focusing on the following questions would be most useful:

Do you believe this program is an appropriate use of Federal funds?

In view of the considerable activity in the States on mandatory seatbelt legislation, is there a need for this program?

What information on this subject do State legislators need that is not now available to them?

What effect will this program have on the enactment of State mandatory belt use laws?

Is this program well structured? If not, what areas are inappropriate?

What have been the results of past federally funded media efforts to promote safety belt usage?

Is the present NHTSA "networking" program to promote safety belt usage effective?

Does this program have an adequate passive restraint education component? If not, what specific activities should the Department be doing in this regard?

Do you think a $20 million per year funding level is appropriate for a program of this nature?

To assist those who may wish to testify, I am submitting for the RECORD a copy of a November 29 letter from the Transportation Secretary outlining implementation plans for this program:

THE SECRETARY OF TRANSPORTATION,
Washington, DC, November 29, 1984.

Hon. Jamie L. Whitten,
Chairman, Appropriations Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR JAMIE: As you know, an important component of the motor vehicle occupant rulemaking I announced on July 11 is an educational program aimed at increasing occupant restraint usage and the enactment of state safety belt use laws. This program will be focused at the state level with funding and technical assistance going to state coalitions, units of government and other appropriate organizations. Information about passive restraints will be an integral part of this program.

The Continuing Resolution included $10 million in initial funding for this program, with $2.5 million being released immediately for planning purposes and $7.5 million to be released after the Senate and House Appropriations Committees have reviewed the Department's program plan. We have now completed a detailed plan for the first $10 million in funding for this program, a copy of which I am pleased to transmit to you.

Our funding needs for this program are $20 million for FY 1985. However, the plan I am enclosing today includes funding only for the $10 million included in the Continuing Resolution. We look forward to discussing the details of the portion of the program which would be funded with an additional $10 million during hearings in the spring.

I will be pleased to discuss this plan with you should you have any questions. I have asked my staff to work directly with your committee staff to thoroughly review the components of the plan. Your approval of this plan is crucial to our efforts to save thousands of American lives each year through increased use of all types of occupant restraints. I very much appreciate your support of this program during the Continuing Resolution process and look forward to working with you as we progress in this important endeavor.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE.

NATIONAL OCCUPANT PROTECTION PROGRAM IMPLEMENTING THE FMVSS 208 DECISION

I. PROGRAM SUMMARY

Introduction

In 1983, more than half of the fatalities that resulted from automobile accidents could have been prevented. Hundreds of thousands of injuries could have been avoided. Billions of dollars of accident-related costs could have been saved. Untold human pain and suffering would have been prevented if all Americans wore safety belts or were protected by passive restraints. On July 11, 1984, Secretary Dole announced a decision that will reduce this unnecessary and tragic toll. Her decision involves a phased introduction of passive restraints in automobiles starting in 1986. In addition, Secretary Dole recognized that the quickest and least costly means to save lives and reduce injuries is to encourage use of the safety belts already in place in passenger cars. However, it is clear that voluntary use campaigns can only go so far; thus the Secretary's decision also encourages states to enact safety belt use laws.

Secretary Dole's announcement included a joint public/private sector program to promote occupant protection. This will be a grassroots effort, involving auto makers, insurers, the medical community, safety officials and organizations, and civic groups. The goal of this program is to generate the same groundswell of citizen support that toughened state and local drunk driving laws—the same kind of citizen action that made child safety seats the law in 49 of our 50 states. The program will include education about manual safety belts and mandatory use laws, as well as passive restraints.

The American public should be informed about the types of occupant protection available to them. They should know the kinds of crashes in which air bags afford protection and those where they do not. They need to know that lap belt use is still necessary in airbag-equipped cars and why automatic safety belts should not be detached. Factual information about passive restraints will be a part of our program. It should be emphasized, however, that since almost 100 percent of the nation's existing vehicle fleet is equipped with manual lap/shoulder belt systems, the primary program benefit expected will be getting people to use the effective safety belts already in their vehicles. Our role is to inform the consumer about the types of occupant protection available and encourage the regular and proper use of occupant restraints.

Polls in many states across the country find a majority of citizens are voicing support for the need for travelers to wear safety belts, and are becoming supportive of safety belt use laws. Similar momentum and attitudinal shifts came about in England, Canada, and other countries that have successfully passed mandatory use laws. New York and New Jersey have passed legislation requiring safety belt use and a significant number of additional states are expected to consider laws in 1985. The news media have begun to focus more attention on occupant protection. In addition, many organizations, such as those within the medical community, are leading a concerted effort to increase the number of people wearing safety belts.

The case for safety belt laws is persuasive. In the 29 foreign countries where safety belt use is mandatory and where statistics are available, highway deaths have declined by an average 25 percent. Similar laws in our country could save 10,000 American lives every year, and could do so far more quickly than any other course of action.

Program strategy

The specific goals of the outreach campaign are:

Save lives and prevent injuries;

Increase public awareness about the benefits of belt use and

Increase belt use;

Increase awareness of benefits of belt use laws; and Increase understanding and acceptance of passive restraints.

To accomplish these goals requires an outreach program that educates the public about the risks involved in driving and the benefits to be gained from using occupant protection systems. The federal government's role will be to provide financial and technical assistance, to develop and help disseminate education materials, to make appropriate use of the media to heighten awareness, and to evaluate ongoing activities to aid in planning and allocation of resources.

State program assistance will demand the largest share of the resources. The cornerstone of this campaign is reaching the public with education and community-supported activities. Strong state programs are the only way to accomplish these objectives. A successful state outreach campaign will require the support and leadership of elected officials; medical, business, and volunteer organizations; and individuals working together in an organized coalition.

The New York experience is an excellent example of what a state coalition can accomplish in informing the public and utilizing an existent infrastructure to effect change. DOT will assist state coalitions to develop strategic plans to accomplish the program goals. Funds will be supplied to these states for administrative and logistical support, for program support at the community level, and for needed materials and training. This is important because the most effective public education strategies have been accomplished at the local level. The success of Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) is the most recent example of creating an atmosphere conducive to change.

A second key area will be continued support for national organizations. Many national organizations have taken strong positions in support of safety belt use and passive protection. Examples include: the PTA, American Public Health Association, American Red Cross, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors. These organizations will continue to be used as conduits for safety belt and passive protection promotion across the country.

Media will be used to reach broad segments of the population within the states and nationally. Such campaigns are valuable to create heightened awareness and reinforcing educational messages. Media will be used to provide the "glue" to make other areas function more effectively and efficiently.

Lessons drawn from Great Britain's experience in conducting an effective national education campaign to increase belt use will be applied. The British were successful in increasing usage rates to 29-33% before the mandatory use law took effect by providing targeted educational messages over a sustained period of time. The Department has had discussions with officials from Great Britain involved in that campaign and with Canadian officials involved in similar campaigns.

A significant amount of money will be dedicated to evaluation and research efforts. Evaluation of innovative programs will enable all states to benefit from the experience of others. Also, national and local surveys about usage, awareness, and attitudes will be needed to measure progress and guide future planning. Market research for a wide variety of audiences will identify new, effective messages and delivery mechanisms.

In initiating the new campaign, a funding level of ten million dollars will allow for concentrated assistance in approximately ten states. States will be selected which have significant grassroots efforts in place on which to build an effective coalition. If additional funding is made available, more states will receive assistance. The need for a $20 million funding level in FY 1985 continues.

II. FUNDING SUMMARY

These resources estimates reflect a level of effort needed to support intensive activity in approximately 10 States, as well as to continue with limited national awareness activities.

III. PROGRAM ACTIVITIES

A. State and local program assistance

To create the necessary environment for increased safety belt use, public acceptance of state safety belt use laws and market acceptance of passive restraints, effective information and educational programs must be undertaken at the local level.

The most effective management technique appears to be use of coalitions made up of elected officials, medical, business, and volunteer organizations, similar to Governors' Task Forces on Drunk Driving. Coalitions will provide leadership, energy, credibility, and organizational support to statewide activities. New York's experience in enacting a belt use law is an excellent example of what a State coalition can do in encouraging education and the enactment of legislation.

DOT will assist individual state coalitions to develop strategic plans reflecting the needs of that State and furthering the goals of the national program. The amounts allocated for individual programs will obviously be larger in some States and smaller in others depending on size, need, and other participating organizations and resources.

Described below are areas of support and the projected budget.

State Coalition Support (Cost: $1,100K)

Coalitions will be provided funding for management and direction of statewide activities. Examples of funding include funds for a full-time coordinator or executive director, and displays for malls, fairs, and meetings. The available funding level will support an initial ten states as described on page 3.

Community Activities (Cost: $1,780K)

Local community activities will play a key role in providing face-to-face education and grass-roots support for statewide activities. Local activities will include integrated community activities featuring education and promotional events, corporate programs, and activities by local chapters of national service organizations.

1. Community Minigrants (Cost: $700K)

Limited grants (not exceeding $10K each) will be awarded to selected communities. These funds will be used to support part of start-up costs for comprehensive program activities in these communities.

An example is Duluth, Minnesota, where $8,000 of government funds initiated a community program that brought in an additional $70,000 from local business and has so far increased belt use three-fold—from 8 percent to over 25 percent.

2. Community Management Courses (Cost: $225K)

One of the most effective means for assisting a community to implement community-wide programs is to conduct workshops for community level coordinators. The principal purpose is to teach community coordinators how to manage community programs.

Management courses will be conducted within States with coalitions to train program coordinators, recruit volunteers, manage and motivate personnel, and solicit support from the private sector (e.g., for incentive programs). Fleet purchasing of passive restraint-equipped vehicles by local governments will also be included.

3. Corporate Support (Cost: $375K)

CEO Recruitment ($100K).—State and community safety belt programs are enhanced by the active support of private businesses, their employees, and the employees' unions. Private employers can educate, provide incentives for belt use, require safety belt use by employees, and provide resources for State and community programs. In addition, union groups can play an important role in adding to the success of these campaigns. There have been many successful corporate programs developed over the last several years. Berg Electronics has achieved and maintained over a 90% usage rate for their employees and has also directed their outreach program to employee families and the community at large. Funding will be directed to seminars for both corporate executive officers and union leadership. The goal of the seminars will be to create top level support for effective corporate programs.

Corporate support will also be sought for fleet purchases of vehicles equipped with passive restraints.

Safety Officers Workshops ($275K).—A counterpart to obtaining the commitment of chief executive officers is providing training for those who implement the programs, which helps to increase chances for success. The corporate safety officer is the necessary element to implement and manage the program. These officers must also be provided orientation and education regarding safety belt programs and passive restraints. Funds will also be directed toward union education and training programs. These workshops will be separate and more detailed than the orientation provided CEO's and union leadership.

4. Military Installation Workshops (Cost: $70K)

Military installations throughout the country are excellent bases to stimulate and support State and community safety belt programs. A joint series of DOT/DOD workshops has recently been completed. This workshop series initiated a significant amount of activity worldwide for all services. A need now exists to train safety center personnel from all the services to continue the education process and to involve themselves in State and community programs. In addition, "how-to" and educational materials will be needed for local installations.

5. Network Mini-grants (Cost: $410K)

The concept of providing small grants to local level chapters of various national organizations has been an effective means for generating local activity.

In each state, local chapters of national organizations (e.g., Red Cross, PTA) will be provided with funds to (a) conduct local training and program outreach; (b) conduct needs assessment, observational surveys and administration evaluation; (c) establish and participate in community coalitions of activist groups; and (d) coordinate community efforts.

An example of an American Public Health Association (APHA) nini-grant is the "Safety Belt Motivation Program" being conducted by the State of New Mexico Health and Environment Department's San Juan County Health Office. The purpose of the project is to increase seat belt use by low-income mothers of children enrolled in the Women, Infant, and Children (WIC) program.

Public Information Workshops (Cost: $200K)

Volunteers, particularly at the community level, frequently do not have a great understanding of the media, particularly how to gain access to the media with news stories and public service announcements.

As requested by numerous state and local groups, coalition personnel, representatives from safety organizations, concerned individuals, and media representatives will be brought together in working sessions to assure that they will work together effectively in bringing messages about occupant restraints to the public. They will be provided with the tools and necessary education to enable them to become more proficient communicators.

Materials for State, Community and Corporate Programs (Cost: $300K)

Supporting State, local, corporate and service organizations involves educational materials for their programs. Materials must cover (a) a variety of messages or themes; (b) separate age groups and (c) different ethnic and socioeconomic groups. This activity will reproduce existing materials and develop and reproduce new materials on safety belts and passive restraints, such as brochures, films, training guides, prepared speeches.

Monitoring State Programs (Cost: $315K)

Knowing how usage rates and attitudes change is essential for supporting voluntary and mandatory efforts to increase belt usage and promote understanding of passive restraints. These surveys should be conducted 2-4 times each year in each state and will provide invaluable feedback for planning and revising the program.

Law Enforcement Training Workshops (Cost: $200K)

As with child safety seat enforcement, police and magistrates must be provided information about the need for safety belts and must be aware of practical, proven enforcement techniques. Law enforcement officers (and local magistrates) must have accurate information about occupant protection and the need to wear belts themselves. These workshops will convey the rationale for use laws and how other jurisdictions have addressed enforcement issues.

Legislative Seminars (Cost: $400K)

The Transportation Research Board, under NHTSA sponsorship, is conducting a legislative educational seminar to discuss model legislation, enforcement, educational needs, and the New York experience in Albany, New York, in November 1984. State legislators, executive branch personnel and other state people will be present. States represented will be Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, Delaware, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Colorado.

State Law Implementation (Cost: $390K)

The New York state law becomes effective on December 1, 1984. NHTSA has been asked to assist in implementation activities, particularly since the effectiveness of the New York law will be of interest to other states passing laws. Assistance will also be available as appropriate to other states passing legislation.

Assist in the creative work and production of educational materials designed to inform the public about the need for wearing safety belts and the law.

Assist in developing an education package and approach for New York police and magistrates.

Develop a Mini-grant system to stimulate community based programs throughout the state.

B. National organization support (Cost: $1,550K)

A number of national organizations have taken strong, supportive positions towards safety belt use and passive protection. Examples include: the PTA, the American Public Health Association, the American Red Cross, the Conference of Mayors. These organizations can be very successful in getting belt messages out, both to their members and the people they affect. The organizations should be used as conduits for safety belt and passive protection messages across the country.

1. National Network Program Resources (Cost: $550K)

In order to manage the increased level of activity at the state and community levels in states where required use legislation is likely and to support programs elsewhere in the country, national organizations will need more resources to coordinate and administer such activities. These funds are for full-time directors/coordinators rather than for materials.

2. Statewide Organization Coordinators (Cost: $300K)

State chapters of national organizations under contract to NHTSA to conduct education nationwide can be great assets to state programs and coalitions. As the state coalitions and programs grow, it becomes more and more necessary to include state coordination and promotion of activities by national organizations under contract to NHTSA. Funds will be used to stimulate state/local chapters of national organizations to join and actively participate in statewide programs.

3. Materials for Networks (Cost: $400K)

The national networks are excellent conduits for distributing educational materials. While some materials are already available, many more will be needed, such as curriculum guides for elementary and secondary school teachers. As with other materials, information will be provided on all forms of occupant protection—active and passive.

4. Program Information Sharing (Cost: $300K)

Information must be readily available concerning (a) state groups and private sector contacts; (b) coalition and legislative activity; (c) state and community promotional activities; and (d) attitude and usage rate shifts.

The National Occupant Restraint Information System (NORIS) is being developed to provide NHTSA, states and communities and other groups with immediately accessible information relative to (a) national organization contacts; (b) local activities; (c) legislative activity in the states; (d) research and evaluation results; and (e) innovative project information.

C. Media development (Cost: $1,400K)

One of the quickest and most direct ways of getting out messages of the new national campaign to Americans across the country is through the media—television, radio, and print. Messages can be created and their communication medium targeted for various age groups, different ethnic and racial backgrounds, and even different socioeconomic levels.

Messages and themes that are developed will become part of the educational messages used in other elements of the campaign. The "theme" of a television spot may become the theme of a handout or brochure that the Red Cross makes available to individuals. The "message" of a radio spot, and its format, may become an important message in speeches given by members of a state safety belt coalition. The media development, therefore, becomes the "glue" that makes the other activities of the campaign work, both in complimenting each other and in obtaining the highest degree of effectiveness possible from those activities. The media component has been an integral part of all successful belt use programs.

Intensive media campaigns went on for several years in Great Britain prior to passage of a mandatory use law.

D. Program integration (Cost: $900K)

To ensure coordination occurs among all groups throughout the campaign, a campaign coordinator will be utilized. The coordinator will help develop an overall theme and direction for the educational efforts. This theme will be carried throughout all messages. The coordinator will also be involved in the process of strategic planning for the overall direction of the campaign.

The coordinator will be responsible for ensuring that publicized private sector educational messages are complementary and reinforcing. It is our intention to avoid duplication of private sector funding efforts, thus communication/coordination is critical.

E. Research and evaluation (Cost: $1,465K)

1. Evaluation of Innovative Programs (Cost: $250K)

As State and community occupant protection efforts continue to expand, new and innovative approaches will be introduced and implemented. As programs are established which are unique in scope, method, or application, a mechanism must exist to assess the merits and the value of these approaches. Prompt evaluation will enable all state and local programs to benefit from the experience of others.

2. National Surveys (Cost: $820K)

National surveys on belt usage, awareness, and attitudes will be performed.

3. New Educational Materials (Cost: $395K)

Market research will continue on a wide spectrum of audiences defined by age, sex, race, and education. Messages and delivery mechanisms will be evaluated. Field tests of innovative programs will be performed.

THE LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, in his State of the Union Message the President repeated this call for a line-item veto. I am pleased to offer legislation today that will do just that.

Recognizing that there have been several ideas advanced on what forms the line-item veto should take, I believe that my specific legislation addresses the main objection that has been voiced so many times by Members of the Congress. That objection goes to the impossibility they say of the legislature delegating authority to the President of this type. My legislation would allow an override of the veto by a simple majority, thus creating a situation in which the President would have the right to line-item veto and then the public will know what that veto is all about and then the legislature, the Congress, if it feels that it cannot abide by that particular veto can override it with a simple majority. Thus giving that double debate feature unlike several of the other ideas that have been advanced.

The President wants a line-item veto. It is an element of budget control. We ought to give it to him.

GOLD COIN BILL

(Mr. DIXON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, about 9 years ago, the South African Government began selling their gold in this country in the form of 1-ounce coins. They created a brand new market for their gold—and the kruggerand has become the most widely recognized symbol of that country. The kruggerand outsells all other gold coins on the market—including coins from Canada and China. The South African Government earns over $400 million per year from coin investors in America alone.

These South African coins, bought and sold in the United States, are a continuing insult to people of conscience in our country. The money paid for these coins goes to the South African Government to support their apartheid system.

The Americans who buy kruggerands, however, are not advocates of racism—they simply want to own the most widely sold gold coin produced. Many of us tried last year to ban the kruggerand, but all the coin investors lobbied against it—not because they favor apartheid—but because there was no alternative available.

My colleague, Mr. LEWIS, and I will shortly introduce a bill that authorizes the U.S. Mint to produce a gold coin that can compete with the South African kruggerand on the world market. Let the symbol of liberty instead of oppression be available to coin dealers and gold investors. Let's provide Americans with the option to support America instead of South Africa.

Let me emphasize that our proposal is to provide an alternative to the kruggerand, and in no way eliminates the need for a total ban on the sale of kruggerands here in the United States. Our plan complements other legislation which will come before Congress to enact meaningful sanctions against apartheid.

I urge my colleagues to support this gold coin legislation.

I would like to insert a copy of the bill for the RECORD.

H.R. 1123

A bill to provide for the minting of gold coins

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Liberty Double-Eagle Bullion Coin Act".

MINTING OF GOLD COINS

SEC. 2. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") shall mint and issue gold double-eagle coins pursuant to this Act.

(b)(1) Each such double-eagle coin—

(A) shall weigh 34.559 grams;

(C) shall have a diameter of 34 millimeters;

(C) shall be minted in accordance with the standard established in the Act of February 12, 1873 (17 Stat. 437); and

(D) shall have reeded edges.

(2)(A) On the obverse of each such double-eagle coin shall appear a design emblematic of the Statue of Liberty.

(B) On the reverse of each such double-eagle coin shall appear a design representing a family of eagles, with the male carrying an olive branch and flying above a nest containing a female eagle and hatchlings.

(C) On each double-eagle coin there shall be inscriptions of the year and of the words "Liberty", "In God We Trust", "United States of America", "E Pluribus Unum", and "One Ounce".

(3) Subject to section 5118 of title 31, United States Code, all such double-eagle coins shall be legal tender as provided in section 5103 of such title at their fair market value.

(c)(1)(A) All such double-eagle coins shall be sold to the public by the Secretary under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe and at a price equal to the cost of minting and issuing such double-eagle coins (including labor, materials, dies, use of machinery, promotion, and overheard expenses) plus a surcharge.

(B) Such surcharge shall be equal to the amount by which the fair market value of gold bullion held by the United States and used in the minting of such double-eagle coins exceeds the statutory maximum value of any gold certificates outstanding against such gold bullion.

(2) All surcharges which are received by the Secretary from the sale of such double-eagle coins shall be deposited in the general fund of the Treasury and shall be used for the sole purpose of reducing the national debt.

(3)(A) The Secretary shall determine the number of such double-eagle coins which will be minted each calendar year.

(B) In making such determination, the Secretary shall consider the demand for gold from all sources and shall establish the number of such coins which will be minted each calendar year at a level which does not depress the price of gold or otherwise reduce the potential revenue from surcharges.

(C) Not less than 60 days before the beginning of each calendar year, the Secretary shall announce to the public the number of such double-eagle coins which will be minted during such calendar year. Such number may be decreased, but shall not be increased, by the Secretary during such calendar year.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. This Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985.

ONLY BENEFITS, NO COSTS, TO A GOLD COINAGE

(Mr. LEWIS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in a few days my colleague Mr. DIXON and I will be introducing a bill to authorize the U.S. Mint to produce a gold coinage in the same form, and with all the important qualities of the South African krugerrand. About 3 million foreign gold coins are imported every year, and Americans buy them. That represents almost $1 billion annually in our balance-of-payments deficit; $400 million of that deficit goes to South Africa.

Why shouldn't we do something to keep that money in the United States? If the U.S. Mint produced those gold coins American buyers are demanding, the money that today is making our trade deficit larger could help instead to make our Federal budget deficit smaller.

It has been estimated by industry spokesmen that over 3,000 U.S. coin and stamp dealers—mostly small businesses in every community in this Nation—employ over 15,000 people, making a market for the gold coin of foreign governments. Over 5 million American participate in the gold coin market as investors.

The bill my colleague and I are proposing is a positive, free-market approach to the problem of the krugerrand coins, which are seen as a symbol of apartheid. If the Congress simply prohibited the South African coins, it would hurt all the coin dealers and damage the expectations of millions of innocent American citizens. Starting the production of an American alternative, however, creates jobs—it does not destroy them; it cuts the market out from under the South Africans in the true spirit of American business—it gives the consumers and investors a superior product.

We urge our colleagues from both sides of the aisle to join us in cosponsoring this positive effect to strike a blow for the American values of liberty and fair play.

MR. STOCKMAN HEAPS FURTHER ABUSE ON AMERICAN FARMERS

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, the President's Budget Director has returned to Capitol Hill to heap further abuse on American farmers. For months now, farm State Members of Congress, from both sides of the aisle, have warned of a looming financial crisis in agriculture, but all too often our statements have fallen on deaf ears at the White House.

Mr. Speaker, we have farmers going out of business now who have been farming all of their lives; farms that have been in the family for generations are being lost. These people, who provide America with the most bountiful, least expensive food in the world, have turned to the Government for help. But rather than provide assistance, the President's Budget Director chose to add insult to injury.

Mr. Stockman is reported to have said he cannot figure out, "why the taxpayers have the responsibility to go in and refinance bad debt willingly incurred by consenting adults who went out and bought farm land when prices were going up and thought they could get rich." His accusation is ludicrous, and shameful.

Mr. Stockman asserted that all of the farmers in trouble were out to make a killing in the land market. He apparently believes that this land, which has been farmed by the same families for years, was actually bought for the sole purpose of selling at a big profit.

Mr. Speaker, I know this is not the case. I am pleased to join with a bipartisan group of colleagues today in introducing legislation to provide immediate assistance to our farmers. For himself, Mr. Stockman has surely earned another trip to the woodshed.

BLACKMAIL HAS NO PLACE IN DEVELOPING A REMEDY FOR AGRICULTURE CRISIS

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, blackmail. David Stockman talking about blackmail. From experience he should know precisely the definition of the word. Webster's definition is extortion by threat. Stockman has demonstrated he knows how to put it in place:

You find someone who is in desperate financial straits then you threaten to cut off avenues of credit unless they capitulate to outrageous demands and shove a contract under their noses and say sign here or we will break your arm.

Blackmail has no place in developing a remedy for the agriculture crisis. We need new, innovative farm policy. Tinkering with existing programs won't work. Existing farm programs do not address the problems agriculture is facing.

Legislation I am introducing along with my colleagues PAT ROBERTS and ARLAN STANGELAND, called the Wheat Export Incentive Act, does address the problems. The bill establishes an export certificate program which would increase producer income and hike exports and get this—would not cost a penny above existing programs.

Never before, Mr. Speaker, has agriculture faced a crisis like we're seeing now. Never before have the farmers and ranchers of this country looked to Congress with such urgent need of a reliable farm bill. Never before has a farm bill been more crucial to the survival of the family farm.

Never before, Mr. Speaker, has farm legislation been more crucial to America. I urge my colleagues to support my legislation.

A DAY PEACE COULD BE FELT

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, Last Sunday in a town in war-ravaged El Salvador, guns were quiet. Left wing soldiers lounged around the town square. Peace could be felt.

The Government was there too but not with guns—with needles and vaccine to immunize the youngest children.

So in a country torn with bloodshed there was a moment of light—and they did it for the children.

We must not lose the larger message. If we were to take as active a role in the Contadora peace process as we have in the arms buildup—getting to the causes of strife—poverty, disease, education—what an advocate for the children America could be.

Children are born with no ideological hatred, whether they are born in El Salvador, America, or Russia.

And, further, children everywhere are not helped by massive arms buildups by all sides and escalation of the arms race to space.

The President has asked us to have courage as we tackle the budget I say to my colleagues, let's gain that courage as we reflect on one peaceful day in a town in El Salvador.

WAKE UP, AMERICA

(Mr. LIGHTFOOT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, in my first official floor statement, I must devote my comments to the most serious hardship the State of Iowa has faced in 40 years, and, indeed, the most difficult times many of my constituents have even seen—what we in the farm belt have begun to refer to as "the farm crisis."

How can a nation which has reaped the benefits of a bountiful and inexpensive food supply stand idly by while as many as 40 percent of our farmers face the possibility of ceasing operation on March 1?

Did I say 40 percent? Some of you may doubt that figure, but based on the reduction of available operating credit in my district, this figure could become reality.

While I must credit Secretary of Agriculture John Block with trying to make his case, I must likewise, shake my head in disbelief at David Stockman's cold hearted indifference. Perhaps when I start bringing my unemployed farmers to camp out on his doorstep he'll be more willing to listen.

True, the structure of American farming has changed over 40 years of Government farm programs—so must Government farm programs change—but no one could pick a worse time to suggest totally eliminating them. Wake up, America, before it's too late, your lifestyle is at stake.

IRR MANPOWER INITIATIVE

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, members of the Individual Ready Reserve make up a pool of mostly pretrained individuals who, during a national emergency, may be assigned as fillers or replacements while newly inducted recruits complete required training. Maintaining sufficient numbers and maintaining up-to-date addresses are the two major IRR problem areas. I intend to take action which will help correct these problems and make the IRR a meaningful source of military manpower.

First, I have reintroduced H.R. 1500, a bill which will allow for the induction of not more than 200,000 persons for training and service in the IRR of the Army Reserve in each fiscal year. Second, I plan to introduce legislation which will: First, extend servicemen's group life insurance coverage to all members of the IRR; second, permit the Internal Revenue Service to disclose the addresses of IRR members; and third, I also plan to provide for bonus incentives for enlistment, reenlistment, and training.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this legislation is needed to obtain the numbers necessary to meet established requirements and to ensure access to members of the IRR during any national emergency. The 99th Congress can play a vital role in our Nation's security by working to help solve these critical IRR problems.

THE B-1 BOMBER

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, let justice be done, seat Rick McIntyre.

Mr. Speaker, I will begin all of my remarks as a Congressman this session, in this Chamber, on any issue, every day I speak with those seven words, "Let justice be done, seat Rick McIntyre" until that act of justice is behind us and my classmate Mr. McIntyre joins us to serve his constituents in the Eighth District of Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, it was on this very day 30 years ago at Bryan Air Force Base in east Texas that I earned my wings of silver as a U.S. Air Force pilot, and it was 15 years ago, also on this very day, that the POW-MIA memorial bracelet was born on a television program that I produced. In recalling those two important events in my life, I decided to rise this afternoon, to speak about an important defense issue affecting the U.S. Air Force and our combat B-52 aircrews, especially when we remember those courageous B-52 airmen who were killed in action over North Vietnam in December of 1972 or were taken prisoner that month after the hottest aerial combat environment since World War II.

When I last rose to address this, the greatest legislative body in world history, it was December 22, 1982, and I spoke about our aging B-52 bomber force and its superb replacement the B-1 bomber. On that day I felt that my undesired departure might never be reversed, and I wanted to make a final plea for a new strategic bomber. My efforts to restore the B-1 Program was a major part of my 6 years of service as a Congressman. By the way, I thank God every day—every day—that I have been fortunate enough to return to serving my country here in Congress with you my colleagues, and to have the honor to represent my new constituents in beautiful Orange County, CA.

In my final 1982 speech I implored those of you who were returning to serve in 1983 and 1984 not to derail, again, our new Strategic Air Command bomber, the B-1 "Excaliber". I pointed out that our SAC officers and airmen have as their challenging motto, "Peace is our profession." And that to serve us in keeping the peace they deserved the best technology this Congress could deliver to them, just as a Congress 30 years ago delivered to me the very best—the then new F-100 "super sabre" jet fighter.

In the last Congress you continued to acknowledge the wisdom of replacing out B-52's. I salute you. Because within 4 months at an Air Force Base in Texas, a great day in U.S. Air Force history is coming to pass.

On a fine Texas spring day sometime this June—ahead of schedule—the first sleek operational B-1B bomber will come roaring across the sky from the west to show its stuff and then land and taxi up to a very proud group of Americans assembled on the flightline ramp of Dyess Air Force Base.

I ask all of my colleagues who fought so hard over so many years for this national defense treasure, the B-1, to be there that fine Texas morning and feel the gratitude of our combat ready aircrews. You have made it much easier for them to honor their sacred pledge to keep the peace.

A SECOND AMERICAN REVOLUTION

(Mr. BONER of Tennessee asked and was given permission to address the house for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, last evening, the President challenged the Congress and the American people to join him in a second American Revolution—a revolution to debate and redefine the future role and activities of the Federal Government.

I accept the President's challenge. With Federal budget deficits exceeding $200 billion a year for the foreseeable future, I also believe that our Nation must begin to make the difficult choice of where to reduce Federal spending and where to shrink Federal activities. We must go beyond the elimination of waste and poor management. We must examine each and every Federal program—whether social or military—and ask if the program is one which the Federal Government should undertake.

And, while I disagree with some of the recommendations the President outlined in his budget submission as well as in his speech last evening, I nonetheless welcome this debate. It will be a healthy and productive venture. Certainly it will require all Members of Congress to suggest and consider policy and program alternatives to those proposed by the President.

This will be an important debate in the history of our Nation. Yet, whether the Congress and the American people reaffirm all or some of our current course or choose to strike out on another, a second American Revolution to redefine the role and activities of the Federal Government will be founded not only on a growing and just economy but, more importantly, on a fair and just society.

HUMANITARIAN RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT OF PAKISTAN

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the humanitarian speedy response of the Government of Pakistan to the continued aggressive attacks by the Soviet Union on innocent people of Afghanistan.

The Pakistani Government has thus far accepted almost 3 million refugees and offered them sanctuary in Pakistan. Their humanitarian efforts have saved the lives of millions of displaced Afghans. The Government of Pakistan has acted in a remarkably efficient manner, in conjunction with the United Nations, in this important undertaking. In addition, the Government has allowed the United Nations to establish procedures within Pakistan to facilitate the settlement of these civilians upon entering the country.

By all accounts, the Pakistanis have done a remarkable job not only of protecting the civilians but by offering them a place of refuge away from the aggressive attacks of the Soviet Union.

THE DANGER OF EXPONENTIAL POPULATION GROWTH CANNOT BE UNDERSTATED

(Mr. MRAZEK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, in 1798, the English economist, Thomas Malthus warned of the dangers of rampant population growth in a world with finite resources. In his essay on the "Principle of Population," Malthus wrote:

> Population, when unchecked, increases in a geometrical ratio. Subsistence increases only in an arithmetical ratio. A slight acquaintance with numbers will show the immensity of the first power in comparison of the second.

In an era when more than 4 billion people inhabit our planet, the danger of exponential population growth on the human condition cannot be understated. Mr. Speaker, last December the Reagan administration ceased funding to the International Planned Parenthood Federation. This organization provides vital educational, nutritional, and family planning services to those areas of the world where they are most desperately needed.

The administration's decision may actually serve to increase the number of abortions carried out overseas if these educational services are curtailed. This week, I am circulating to my colleagues a letter to President Reagan urging him to reconsider this precipitous and unfortunate decision, and I would welcome colleagues' endorsement of this action.

THE INCREASING INCIDENCE OF INFANTICIDE

(Mr. COBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I am gravely concerned about the increasing incidence of infanticide occurring in our country. The death of "Baby Doe" in 1982 was not an isolated incident. It is becoming more common to hear cases where handicapped children are being withheld necessary medical treatment to keep them alive. I support the "Baby Doe" regulations issued by the Department of Health and Human Services which would withhold Federal funding from hospitals and institutions that deny food, water, and medical treatment from disabled infants in critical life-and-death situations.

We cannot use the quality-of-life criteria as a basis of administering medical treatment. Let us support and respect the sanctity of life for the preborn, the infant, and the handicapped. Let us join in and support this critical life-or-death issue.

DOUBLESPEAK

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President, in his State of the Union Address, indicated that through American research we have made great strides in finding a cure for cancer and certain heart diseases. I agree with that, but today I learned that David Stockman is attempting to thwart the will of Congress.

He had arbitrarily stated that there will be a cap on research grants.

This administration has been able to get away with this type of doublespeak before. Are the manufacture of bombs, tanks, the cost overruns of $7,000 coffeepots more important than grants for research for a cancer cure? The American people should be outraged of Stockman's actions and ask the President if he agrees with this action. Which is it, Mr. President? Will we have this cancer research continue, or will you support Stockman's efforts to gut our cancer research and other health programs in this area? Or is this another example of the doublespeak of your administration for which you have become very famous?

TRUTH, FAIRNESS, AND JUSTICE

(Mr. BOULTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, there are 27 U.S. Representatives in this House representing the great State of Texas; 17 Democrats and 10 Republicans, and usually we cooperate in a very good fashion to represent the interests of our State and of Americans.

I would like to congratulate the 13 Members from Texas who voted for truth, fairness, and justice to seat Rick McIntyre. I would also like to apologize to the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana for the 14 Members from Texas who did not vote to seat Rick McIntyre, and expecially to congratulate my Democrat colleagues, Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., Mr. RALPH M. HALL, and Mr. STENHOLM, who put truth, fairness, and justice above partisanship.

PROPOSED BUDGET CUTS WILL HURT TERRITORIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from the Virgin Islands [Mr. DE LUGO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, last night in this Chamber, the President gave his State of the Union Address, and we heard our President lay out his legislative agenda, an agenda that we know from his budget proposal will include deep cuts and even complete elimination of certain programs. Many in this House have already decried the severe cuts that will affect the poor and the middle classes, and which will eliminate whole programs that have had a proven track record of success in moving people from poverty to the mainstream of American life.

Nowhere, Mr. Speaker, will those cuts be felt more deeply than in the territories of the United States. It has only been in the last three decades that the insular areas have been able to move from the indescribable poverty in which they barely subsisted, to the beginnings of participation in that mainstream.

For decades prior to the recent past, these territories were ignored and neglected to the point that one American President, earlier this century, referred to one of them, my own district of the U.S. Virgin Islands, as "an effective poorhouse."

That has been changing over the past three decades only because Congress came to recognize its plenary constitutional authority over the territories, and its inherent responsibilities to the territories under that authority.

In measured steps and with deliberation, Congress has gradually extended political, social and economic rights and participatory powers to our territories.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues understand just how recent these changes are.

Until 1970, the American citizens of the U.S. Virgin Islands could not elect their own Governor; Puerto Rico had no constitution until 1954; neither Guam nor the U.S. Virgin Islands had representation in the Congress until 1973; and American Samoa, not until 1981. To this day, American citizens in all of the insular areas cannot vote for President of the United States.

In encouraging political growth in the insular areas, Congress also recognized political advancement was a meaningless concept without economic improvement. By gradually increasing territorial participation in national programs, and by developing special trade and investment incentives for the offshore areas, Congress laid the groundwork for the emergence of a middle class, which is the bulwark of our American way of life.

The change has been dramatic. In these past three decades the offshore areas of our country have gone from being two-class colonies, whose very existence was a potential embarrassment to the United States, to laboratories of healthy, nonviolent revolutions—living proof of how effective national policy can be in bringing about positive political, social and economic change.

However, what the President last night referred to as "the second American Revolution" could end that healthy revolution now occurring in the territories of the United States, and will end it, unfortunately, just when the desired goals are in sight. Not only will the large numbers of poor in the territories be severely hurt by the proposed budget, but movement to the middle class will cease, and the tenuous gains of the new middle class, so crucial to continued stability in the territories, will be dangerously eroded.

The proposed cuts will hurt the territories in the most potentially damaging areas: education, which is the only salvation of our young people who make up an inordinate percentage of our populations; small business development, which is the only way to ensure that indigenous territorial residents have a piece of the pie; infrastructure assistance, without which we cannot compete for industry.

In addition to these proposed cuts and program eliminations, the territories are faced with, and have been faced with unilateral Federal actions affecting our trade and industrial incentive tax programs. These actions are pulling the pegs out from under these territories economically, pegs that Congress created as the basis of territorial economic policy. No State in the Union is faced with this triple assault.

Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the President's budget, I will be asking my colleagues here in the House to look at the impact on the U.S. territories and to understand fully that the policies set by Congress over the past three decades is at stake, as well as Congress's power to set that policy.

FOSTER GRANDPARENTS MONTH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the President proclaim the month of October 1985 as National Foster Grandparents month.

This year the Foster Grandparents Program celebrates its 20th anniversary. During this period the program has grown from 33 projects in 27 States involving 782 senior citizens to a program providing meaningful volunteer opportunities to 19,000 Foster Grandparents in 245 projects in all 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

Foster Grandparents are low-income persons aged 60 years or over. As volunteers, they receive 40 hours of preservice training designed to maximize their effectiveness as Foster Grandparents. Once training is completed, they serve 20 hours each week as Foster Grandparents, providing loving care and attention to children. As Foster Grandparents, the volunteers enjoy improved health and independence. The children served also benefit in their physical, social, and psychological development.

The Foster Grandparent Program is one of the most innovative, meaningful volunteer programs supported by the Federal Government. It is a tangible and successful reflection of our Nation's commitment to assist senior citizens seeking to continue to be full, contributing participants in our society.

The resolution I am introducing will help focus public attention on this worthwhile program. I urge my colleagues to join with me as cosponsors of the resolution.●

JOINT HEARING SCHEDULED ON STATUE OF LIBERTY COIN PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in at least 20 years, the Banking Committees of the House and Senate will hold a joint hearing. Chairman JAKE GARN of the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee has agreed to hold a Joint Session with the House Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee on legislation that will establish a commorative coin program for the 100th anniversary of the Statue of Liberty and the restoration of Ellis Island, the former U.S. Immigration Center in New York Harbor.

The hearing will be held on Wednesday, February 20, at 9 a.m. in room 2128, Rayburn House Office Building. Testimony will be heard on H.R. 47, which I introduced on January 3, and an identical bill, S. 233, introduced by Senator ALFONSE D'AMATO and Senator GARN.

I am extremely grateful that Chairman GARN has agreed to the joint hearing because it will greatly speed up the passage of this much-needed legislation. The quicker we can get the legislation enacted, the quicker funds will begin flowing to the restoration program.

While restoration work has begun on the Statue of Liberty, there is still a great deal more work to be done, and additional funds are desperately needed. Only minor renovation has been done at Ellis Island, and further work cannot be started until more funds are raised.

The coins, a $5 gold piece, a $1 silver coin and a clad-50-cent piece, will be struck by the U.S. Mint and sold by the Federal Government. Each coin will carry a surcharge ranging from $2 to $35. The maximum number of coins to be minted is 35.5 million. If all the coins are sold, up to $137.5 million will go to the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation to complete the necessary renovation work. And, the program will cost taxpayers not a single worn penny.

Witnesses for the hearing include Lee Iacocca, chairman, Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation, Hon. FRANK J. GUARINI, U.S. Representative from New Jersey, plus representatives of the U.S. Mint and the Department of the Interior.

The proposed program will help restore one of America's greatest treasures, and the symbol of one of our most treasured values—liberty. Mr. Speaker, I urge my fellow Members of Congress to support the program introduced by Chairman GARN and myself. Those wishing to cosponsor H.R. 47 may contact Judi Shellenberger at the Consumer Affairs and Coinage Office, 226-3280.●

CANADIAN SOFTWOOD IMPORT CONTROL ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced, along with Congressmen LARRY CRAIG, BERYL ANTHONY and 19 other Members of Congress, the Canadian Softwood Import Control Act. Our bill will limit imports of Canadian softwood lumber, siding, shakes and shingles, and particle board for a period of 5 years from the date of enactment. There is strong bipartisan support for the measure from every timber producing region in the country.

Between 1978 and 1982 U.S. softwood lumber consumption fell by nearly one-third. Last year, softwood lumber consumption recovered to near record levels, with housing starts reaching 1.8 million. Far from celebrating this upturn, the Nation's timber industry is fighting for its survival. At the end of 1984 only 650 mills were operating in the West, compared with 818 in 1979. In 1 week this month, nine mills were permanently closed in Oregon, eliminating over 2,000 jobs.

While U.S. producers have been forced to cut back production, Canadian softwood lumber imports have risen dramatically. In 1975, imports from Canada accounted for only 19 percent of U.S. consumption. Last year they took over 30 percent of the U.S. market.

Our bill will limit imports of Canadian softwood lumber, siding, shakes and shingles, and particle board to each item's historic pecentage of U.S consumption, based on the 10-year period from 1970 to 1979. For 5 years after the bill is enacted, total allowable imports will be determined by the Secretary of Commerce, based on estimates of U.S. consumption each year. The Secretary will be authorized to make necessary adjustments that result from actual consumption, and also to limit allowable quantities during any quarter to prevent surges in imports of any particular item.

It is our obligation to take every necessary step to protect the Amercian workers and communities that depend on the wood products industry. We value very highly our good neighbor relationship with Canada. In the past, when demand exceeded our industry's capacity to supply wood products, Canadian mills helped meet the shortfall. We sincerely hope the industry will again reach that point. In the meantime, we cannot afford to export our workers' jobs, nor can our communities afford the cost in human suffering caused by curtailments, shutdowns and closures of our mills.

Finally, after announcing our intention to introduce this bill, we were heartened by U.S. Trade Representative Brock and Canadian Trade Minister Kelleher's agreement to call a trade delegation meeting to discuss the possibility of holding lumber trade negotiations. We would truly welcome serious negotiations to establish voluntary import limitations that would make unnecessary the legislation we are proposing.●

MILITARY FAMILY SERVICES ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation (H.R. 1020) to strengthen the human dimension of our national defenses.

Nearly 6 months have passed since the tragic death of 13-year-old Danny Holley first rocked the community in which he lived and sent shock waves across our Nation. While the pain of his loss will undoubtedly ease with the passage of time, the legacy of his untimely death carries an enduring challenge to which we, as a Nation, must come to terms.

As my colleagues will recall, Danny and his family moved to California from Germany following the transfer of his father, Army Sgt. Johnnie Holley. Once there, the family fell deeply in debt as the cost of moving consumed their savings and promised onpost housing failed to materialize. Sergeant Holley's departure for duty in Korea added to the family's hardships and isolation.

Young Danny took his responsibilities as the eldest of four very seriously. One day in August, when the burden got to be too much for his young shoulders, Danny took his own life. His was the ultimate act of love for his family: he had convinced himself that their problems would ease if there were just one less mouth to feed.

We are all a part of the extended family of Danny Holley by virtue of the poignant circumstances of his story. Who among us did not feel a sense of helplessness in wondering how we had failed this desperate young boy and his struggling family? Surely the sorrow and grief that this shared loss invokes ought to be applied constructively in searching for means of easing the strain of military life.

Mr. Speaker, more is at stake than the outpouring of concern over the loss of one so young. Morale is an essential ingredient of an effective military, and morale cannot be what it should be if families are forced to live on food stamps and children give up hope.

One of the most basic requirements of any military is to ensure that its forces are adequately paid, fed, housed, and given the medical attention they require to maintain a state of constant readiness. With the advent of today's All-Volunteer Force, fulfilling these commitments has assumed an even greater importance.

The quality of life we offer service people and their families is central to our success in attracting and retaining the qualified people we need to operate today's increasingly sophisticated weapons systems. If we are to fulfill our manpower requirements, we need to extend benefits and services which are not only fair to the member, but which also recognize the unique circumstances of military service. To be effective, we need to recognize the special role of the family unit in contributing to the welfare and stability of the military community as a whole.

The military has undergone many important changes since the creation of the volunteer force. More of our uniformed personnel are married than ever before—52 percent compared to only 32 percent 30 years ago. among career personnel the figure approaches 80 percent.

Service personnel and their families are today deployed in more countries around the globe, scattered throughout some 90 foreign countries. As a result, today's military family moves on the average of every 2 years. And that in itself gives an idea of some of the special problems our military families face.

Despite record peacetime spending on defense, however, we have failed to respond to many of these needs. I know I am not alone in expressing my shock about reports that military families have been forced to rely on food stamps to put food on the table. Surely we as a nation, in asking the supreme sacrifice of life in our defense, ought to better provide for military personnel and their families.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to share a plan I am proposing to improve our investment in the human dimension of our defenses. Briefly, the Military Family Services Act would improve benefits and services in four vital areas:

1. PERMANENT CHANGE OF STATION REIMBURSEMENTS

The Air Force estimates the median unreimbursed cost incurred during Government-order travel to be $1,510 for midlevel enlisted members and $1,969 for junior officers. Accordingly, the plan I propose would overhaul mileage and household goods weight allowances to reflect better the high costs of travel. In addition, I propose that a temporary lodging allowance be provided to enlisted personnel whose ability to absorb travel costs is limited by their low rate of pay.

2. DEPENDENT DENTAL CARE

A second area of concern throughout the services is the kind of care provided to military dependents. I propose to authorize a voluntary enrollment dental plan under which basic dental care would be available for the first time to dependents of active duty members. The costs of this program would be shared by the member and the Government, with the latter contributing not more than 60 percent nor less than 40 percent of the premium.

3. OFF-BASE HOUSING BENEFITS

As the Holley case demonstrated, many military families arrive at their new post deeply in debt as a result of the unreimbursed travel costs. This hardship is immediately compounded in areas where onbase housing is not available.

The last Congress made several important changes in the way housing allowances are calculated. I believe, however, that additional improvements are necessary to reduce the financial burden for enlisted personnel with limited discretionary spending. The plan I propose would reduce to 12 percent the maximum unreimbursed costs for enlisted personnel renting offbase.

Similarly, experience has shown that required security deposits can greatly contribute to the hardships of frequently moving military families. For this reason, I propose to authorize a pilot program to test the feasibility of an offbase rental housing lease indemnity program under which civilian lessors would forgo security deposits in return for a guarantee that any damages or losses resulting from breach of contract would be covered by the service member's command. Payroll deductions, in turn, would cover any unpaid balances.

4. OFFICE OF MILITARY FAMILY SERVICES

Finally, to meet the ever-changing needs of our military people and to ensure uniform availability of services, I propose the creation of an Office of Military Family Services responsible for developing and administering a servicewide family program. Services to be provided shall include: First, financial and family counseling; second, resource and information referral services; third, spouse employment referral services; fourth, consumer protection; and five, family advocacy services. In addition, the Office of Military Family Services would be required to operate an Outreach Program targeted at families separated by overseas assignments.

The director of military family services shall report to the Secretary of Defense on matters related to military families and on how current policies could be adapted to improve the quality of life of military families.

It is extremely regrettable that the increased investment of the past 4 years in high-priced military technology has not been matched by a similar commitment to the services' human component. We must not forget that the most expensive weapon system is of little value without competent, highly motivated service personnel.

Mr. Speaker, we must respond to the special needs of military families if we are going to attract our best young people to military service, if we are going to be sure that military people remain ready to perform their mission not distracted by doubts or family worries, and if we are going to be fair to members and their families for the sacrifices of military service.

Above all else, service members and their families should be able to enjoy the benefits of the society they are pledged to defend.

I urge all my colleagues to join me in this effort.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 7. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985.●

CENTENNIAL OF MRS. BESS TRUMAN

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WHEAT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, next Wednesday, February 13, is the centennial of the birth of one of our truly inspiring First Ladies, Mrs. Bess Truman. She is probably the most unheralded First Lady of modern times. That was the way she wanted it, and to a surprising extent that was the way it stayed. She fought efforts by the press and the public to lure her into the spotlight. Once, she described her role of First Lady as requiring a wife to—and I quote—"sit beside her husband, be silent and be sure her hat is on straight."

The fifth generation of a prosperous family in Independence, MO, Elizabeth Wallace grew up a blue-eyed, blond-curled tomboy. From early childhood, she was known as "Bess." She was the best third baseman in the neighborhood, a first-rate tennis player, and the only girl in town who could whistle through her front teeth.

She was 5 when a 6-year-old boy named Harry Truman fell in love with her at Sunday school in 1890. Later, in grammar school, he managed to carry her books, a practice that continued through high school. Bess was the only girl Harry ever courted and their courtship was carried on with letters. For more than a decade before their marriage in 1919, Bess stayed at her home in Independence, while President Truman worked his family farm near Grandview or traveled out of State investigating land and mining deals.

Truman's courting style was direct. In one of his letters, he writes—and I quote—"Speaking of diamonds, would you wear a solitaire on your left hand should I get it?" The answer was yes in 1917 as they became engaged as he was leaving for Army service overseas during World War I. After he returned from the war 2 years later, they were married in a simple ceremony.

Someone once asked Mr. Truman's mother why her son had not married until he was 35 years old. "Maybe Bess wouldn't have him before then," was her reply.

The Trumans stayed married for 53 years, through a failed business, hardball local politics, and Truman's sudden rise to the White House and leadership of the postwar world.

Bess always insisted that her husband's eminence had nothing to do with her. She always stated matter-of-factly that she was "only the President's wife and the mother of his daughter."

Bess Truman was not a political power in her own right, like Eleanor Roosevelt, or glamorous, like Jacqueline Kennedy. She had no protégés, she held no press conferences.

Her unassuming public profile, however, did not diminish her stature in the hearts and minds of millions of Americans. The only daughter in a smalltown family, Bess Truman was respected and loved by Americans because she embodied the basic decency of this country. Americans found reassurance and inspiration in the virtues Mrs. Truman personified. She was from Independence, MO, our country's heartland, and she cherished all the best values of smalltown America. She was warm, friendly, and home-loving. Her family came first and that feeling was reciprocated by her husband and daughter Margaret.

Mrs. Truman had a sense of duty, dignity and quiet pride, and a sense of proportion. She was correct and gracious about everything she did in the White House, and she served the country and her husband well.

President Truman lovingly called Bess, "the boss" and "my chief adviser." Although reserved in public, she was good-natured and had a sharp, dry sense of humor. Unfortunately, too few people were offered examples of that side of Bess Truman. One which was recounted freely by the President involved their love letters. Shortly after he became President, Truman found Bess burning a stack of his old love letters. He protested, saying she should think of history. I have, was her reply.

She quietly served as President Truman's closest confidante and adviser. She even attempted—often unsuccessfully—to smooth some of the rough edges her husband had acquired during his rise through the rough-and-tumble world of Midwestern Democratic politics. A widely circulated story demonstrated her attempts to tone down President Truman's use of salty language. Mrs. Truman and a friend were in the audience for a speech the President was giving at a Grange convention. Truman told the Grangers, "I grew up on a farm and one thing I'm sure about—farming means manure, manure, manure, and more manure."

Down in the audience Mrs. Truman's friend whispered to her, "Bess, why on earth can't you get Harry to say fertilizer?" She replied, "Good Lord, Helen, it's taken me 30 years to get him to say manure."

When President Truman told an audience that Texans who voted for Richard Nixon could—quote—go to hell, she quickly scolded him. Telephoning him shortly after the speech, she told the President, "If you can't talk more politely than that in public, you come right home." She was always the lady, and she always kept her views private.

Once in 1955, she was asked on national TV if she had anything to say about politics, "specifically or in general." Her answer: Not in either category, thank you. In this era of celebrity politics, it is easy to misunderstand her statement and forget that genuine public service can be rendered by private people.

The Trumans—Harry, Bess, and Margaret—were a close family. They cared about each other's opinions. They enjoyed each other's company and they spent countless hours together in the White House. The household staff at the White House fondly called them the Three Musketeers.

Mrs. Truman was adamant that the President would not destroy her family and the life they all enjoyed. The family spent hours upon hours playing the piano together, ping-pong and bridge, and watching movies in the White House theater. It was a loving family full of teasing and joking held together by the steady hand of Bess.

Mrs. Truman demonstrated that the public good often is best served by private virtue. Bess Truman's priorities were always clear: Raising their child, tending their home, and staying in touch with old friends. Bess Truman reminded America of someone we love—a mother, a teacher, a favorite aunt. We admired her because she and President Truman reaffirmed something we like to believe about ourselves: That decent, hard-working plain-spoken people are the foundation of our fundamental courage and resourcefulness.

When Bess and Harry Truman left the White House and returned to a private life in Independence, MO, they were greeted by 15,000 admirers and well-wishers. More importantly, they returned to Independence as the same people who had left 17 years before: Honest, unpretentious Midwesterners. During their stay, he had done an extraordinary job. So had she.

After they retired to Independence, the couple rarely traveled away from home. The Trumans came to Washington occasionally and visited their daughter and her family in New York. In 1969, they celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary at home in Independence with an exchange of gifts, and visits from friends and relatives. Their 50th wedding anniversary was more than a day of good cheer. It was a testimonial to the simple and decent values that the Trumans cherished. Who amongst us isn't touched by a story of childhood sweethearts who marry, have a family, live in a white clapboard house and still hold hands and enjoy private jokes on their 50th wedding anniversary.

She died at the age of 97 in 1982. Fittingly, she was buried alongside her husband. The funeral service was a brief and simple ceremony and no eulogies and grand speeches were given. The respect and affection bestowed upon Bess Truman by Americans throughout her life served as her eulogy. She would have wanted it that way.

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, the gracious First Lady from Independence, MO, Bess Wallace Truman, if she were alive today, probably would have wanted her 100th birthday on February 13 celebrated with little fanfare. As the loving, family-oriented woman she was, just having her family by her side would have most likely been her celebration.

Those of us here today remember Mrs. Truman as a strong but gentle partner to her husband, President Harry S. Truman, and a guiding influence to her daughter Margaret. Her closest friends knew her as a wit, with a lively understanding of the people she came in contact with. But her quiet Missouri spirit, and her pride, dignity, and independence were well recognized and are what most of us remember her for. The return to Independence and the family home after the Truman Presidency was a reflection of that down home spirit she believed in and was admired for by all Americans.

May we honor and pay tribute to First Lady Bess Truman on her 100th birthday as the lovely lady which she was and remember her as one of our Nation's most admired and respected First Ladies.●

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to remember the 100th birthday of a great woman in American history, Bess Truman. This good and honest person influenced our national destiny, and helped guide this country through some of its greatest trials.

By providing President Truman with commonsense wisdom and solace on decisions that weighed heavily upon his conscience, she helped instill the basic values and principles of bedrock America at the highest levels of government. Far from being overshadowed by Harry Truman's presence, she had a delightful and unique identity of her own. Through her unpretentious and ever gracious manner, she came to win the respect and affection of all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, we as Americans all miss Mrs. Truman, for she personified everything good about our Nation. She will always live on in our hearts, a woman of simple origins, who helped to shape the course of world events—a woman who was truly able to walk with kings, but never lost sight of her humble roots.●

● Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, with the 100th anniversary of her birth soon approaching, this is indeed an appropriate time to honor Bess Wallace Truman, a remarkable woman whose exemplary qualities complemented and contributed greatly to the success of her husband and his Presidency.

The former Miss Bess Wallace and Harry S. Truman were schoolmates from grade school through high school in the Independence public school system. However, their courtship did not begin until many years after their high school graduation.

Although Bess Wallace actively participated in school and community activities during her years growing up in Independence, she would consistently play her role in a quiet, unassuming manner. Incredibly, marriage and a progressively more public life did not significantly change these traits, even when she was placed in the country's limelight as the wife of the President.

Although she possessed her own vivid and unique personality, Bess had made the decision early in her marriage to Harry S. Truman to remain in the background, where she felt she could best be of service to him and her country. As Mr. Truman's political career flourished, and public attention increased, Mrs. Truman continuously resisted the efforts of the press and public to pry her out of the place she had chosen for herself. From living a "normal" lifestyle in Missouri to eventually inhabiting the White House, Bess Truman felt keenly that her first duty was to be a good wife and mother—obligations she so abundantly fulfilled.

Possessing a quiet disposition and desiring a simple lifestyle for herself and her family made it difficult for Mrs. Truman to succeed the highly visible and vocal Eleanor Roosevelt as First Lady. However, the sincerity she displayed in her devotion to her husband, family, and country endeared this distinctive First Lady to the hearts of America. Her ability to meet both triumphs and with a graceful, quiet dignity won her the respect and admiration of the Nation during her years at the White House and on until her death in 1982.

Mrs. Truman's preference to avoid personal publicity minimized her visibility to the Nation. However, her courage, unselfish diligence, and hearty sense of humor became very apparent to the country as she helped her husband lead our Nation through a very critical time.

There is no question that Mrs. Truman played an invaluable part in her husband's Presidency. President Truman often commented that she was his chief adviser, assisting him in everything—politically and personally.

Bess Truman's faithful dedication to her strong family and patriotic values, combined with her unique sense of individualism, continue to set a great example for the people of this Nation.

We honor Bess Wallace Truman today not only because she was a gracious First Lady, but also because she was, to put it simply, a great lady.

Thank you.●

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to participate in this special order to celebrate the centennial of the birth of Mrs. Elizabeth "Bess" Truman.

Affectionately known as the Boss in the Truman household, President Truman once said, "She was my chief adviser always. She always helped me in everything. She was a full partner in all my transactions—political or otherwise."

Born in Independence, MO, in 1885, Bess and the future President first met in the second grade and later graduated from high school together. The Trumans' daughter, Mrs. Margaret Daniel, has written of those years, "From all I can gather, although not from her, as her modesty is so deep seated nothing can be done about it, she was an Independence belle. She was a crack tennis player and distinguished herself in boarding school by winning the shot-put in a track meet. Her own comment on this last is that it certainly has come in handy for shaking hands with a thousand people at a time. It's also reported that mother could whistle through her teeth, play baseball and best all comers at mumbletypeg."

It wasn't until 1919 that the former Bess Wallace and Harry Truman were married.

Their humble lives were changed forever when on April 12, 1945, President Roosevelt passed away. It must have been quite difficult for Bess to be thrown into the spotlight and be expected by the Nation to fill the shoes of Eleanor Roosevelt. I was glad to see Bess forge her own course on how she perceived her role as the First Lady. Even in this powerful position, she never lost her quiet and unassuming ways and continued to be the warm, caring person from America's heartland.

My wife, Lee, joins me in this salute to Bess Truman. She served her family and her country in the highest standards and we know she will continue to be looked upon as one of America's greatest First Ladies.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

THE NUCLEAR POWERPLANT STANDARDIZATION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join distinguished colleagues on both sides of the aisle today in reintroducing the Nuclear Powerplant Standardization Act. Identical legislation was introduced last Congress by a bipartisan group of colleagues who recognize the need for nuclear licensing reform. Although hearings on this issue were held in the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee last Congress, this legislation was not acted upon. America's nuclear regulatory and licensing process is ripe for reform—we must address this critically important issue in this Congress.

There is a growing bipartisan consensus in America, Mr. Speaker, that sweeping changes in the existing licensing and regulatory process are needed to preserve the nuclear option. We have been reading almost daily for over a year about the difficulties associated with nuclear powerplants. Utilities are being forced to abandon newly and nearly completed nuclear construction projects worth billions of dollars, but which the utilities cannot afford to finish because they have no assurance that the plants will ever be allowed to operate. Over 100 plants have been canceled since 1972. In 1984 alone, nine reactors worth over $10 billion on which substantial work had been completed were abandoned.

There can be no doubt that these difficulties are due in large measure to the manner in which the Federal Government regulates this industry. The laws governing the regulation and licensing of nuclear powerplants have not been overhauled since they were enacted in 1954, and they are inhibiting the development of this critically important energy resource. The industry and its regulators are caught in a quagmire of regulations which prolong construction time, divert the industry and its regulators from important safety work, and impose new and modified requirements without regard to cost and overall plant and industry safety. Regulation has become far too complex—with technical issues being raised far faster than they are being resolved. There is almost universal dissatisfaction with the effectiveness of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Few utilities would consider ordering a new nuclear plant under the current regulatory regime.

The legislation we are introducing today focuses on the legislative reforms necessary to encourage regulatory stability and the development of standardized designs. Standardized designs will promote safety by concentrating the resources of designers, engineers, and vendors on a few improved designs, and by stimulating standardized programs of construction practice and quality assurance. It will also facilitate the sharing of construction and operating experience within the industry, which will in turn promote improved performance. To the extent certainty is introduced into the regulatory process, the utilities will benefit by being able to make reasoned decisions concerning the viability of nuclear power.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation's economic health is becoming ever more dependent on a reliable and reasonably priced supply of electricity. For more than a decade, industry has been shifting from directly burning fossil fuels to the use of electric power. This phenomenon has not been limited to industrial customers. Since 1978, more than half of the single-family houses that have been built are heated with electricity. And there are excellent reasons for this—it is clean, efficient, and cost effective. Even during our economy's dismal performance during the 1970's and early 1980's when the use of nonelectric energy declined by almost 16 percent, demand for electricity actually grew by 33 percent.

Our Nation cannot afford to foreclose the nuclear option. Realistically, there are only two fuels available to meet our future energy needs—coal and uranium. While oil prices appear favorable today, I don't believe anyone would advocate tying our electric supply again to this volatile resource. Alternative sources, such as solar, appear unable to deliver the amounts of electrical energy necessary to drive our economy. But if we are to benefit from a healthy competition between coal and nuclear—we in Congress must act now, this year, to revamp the nuclear regulatory process. Due to the financial and regulatory risks inherent in large construction projects, utilities are deferring planning the generation facilities which the Department of Energy and many others believe are necessary to meet our Nation's electricity needs in the 1990's. As an editorial in the Washington Post pointed out earlier this month:

> The United States is drifting slowly toward a shortage of electric power. For reasons that are chiefly financial, utilities have been scaling back their construction plans for new generating plants. If the country stays on its present track, the demand for power will begin pressing the limits of supply some time in the 1990s.

This is not a problem that can be postponed. Electricity consumption grew by almost 6 percent in 1984. The excess capacity that exists today in certain regions of the country may well vanish in the next few years now that our economy has returned to a healthy growth rate. In certain regions of the country, peak consumption is already hitting reserve margins. Last summer a 5-percent voltage reduction had to be imposed on 21 million customers on the eastern seaboard because demand was pushing too close to available supply. Apparently, blackouts were only avoided in certain regions of our country by customers' energy conservation efforts and expensive purchases of power from neighboring utilities.

Mr. Speaker, the public has a right to expect congressional action on the difficulties threatening America's nuclear option—the stakes are too great. The costs of too little capacity are clear. If faced with this situation, brownouts will allocate limited supply. Electricity costs will rise as uneconomic and inefficient generators are rushed into service. These costs will be borne by consumers. Most importantly, higher costs and unreliability of electricity will constrain economic growth. Businesses will expand their operations in other countries and may in fact relocate their existing operations. American jobs will be lost, our balance of trade will suffer, and consumers' purchasing power will decline.

This trend has already begun—last year American utilities spent about $1 billion importing electricity, almost all of which came from Canada. Nicholas Patterson, an Ottawa consultant, estimates that Canada's electricity exports could double by 1986 and redouble by 1990. Our Nation is paying Canada to build the capacity to supply our energy needs—capacity we are apparently unwilling to build for ourselves. This represents a loss of jobs for American workers, hurts our balance of trade, and ties our Nation's electrical system to a foreign source of uncertain reliability. We are often told of the availability of Canadian hydroelectric power—but we rarely hear about the fact that over the last 14 years hydro Quebec has suffered 13 partial system failures and 9 systemwide failures.

Mr. Speaker, hardly a day goes by that we do not read or hear about canceled or mothballed nuclear plants, cost overruns, and licensing delays. The impact on our economy is enormous—both in terms of short-term increases in electricity rates and the profound long-term consequences. We do not contend that all of these cancellations, delays, and excess costs are attributable to the current nuclear regulatory process, but we do believe that Congress has the obligation to restructure a 30-year-old regulatory process which almost everyone agrees is not working in the best interests of the industry or the public.

I joined Congressmen JOHN DINGELL, MO UDALL, DON FUQUA, and other colleagues from both sides of the aisle 3 years ago, in a bipartisan effort to address the issues associated with the permanent disposal of high level nuclear waste. This effort culminated in a comprehensive piece of essential legislation—the Nuclear Waste Policy Act. I now call upon my esteemed friends to join with me again in order to fashion a solution to the problems plaguing the regulation of nuclear power. Failure to act on these problems is nothing less than an abrogation of our leadership responsibilities. A complete section-by-section analysis of this legislation accompanies this statement, we urge our colleagues to study this issue and to join us as cosponsors of this vital legislation.

The summary follows:

SUMMARY OF THE MAJOR PROVISIONS OF THE NUCLEAR POWERPLANT STANDARDIZATION ACT OF 1985

SECTION 101. APPROVAL OF STANDARDIZED DESIGNS

Section 101 adds a new section which would direct the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to develop an approval process for standardized designs. The design approval would be utilized in subsequent NRC licensing proceedings. The standards and criteria necessary to approve a standardized design would be a matter appropriately left to Commission discretion and expertise. Under current NRC regulations, vendors are allowed to seek approval of preliminary or final designs, but such approvals are not binding on the Commission. Thus, there is little incentive for vendors to develop, and utilities to utilize, standardized designs because of the existing uncertainty of the approvals.

Under the new law, design approvals would remain valid for ten years, and could be renewed for additional ten year periods. To promote regulatory stability and encourage the development of standardized designs, determinations made in design approval proceedings would be adhered to unless there is a compelling reason to change the design. The need to change designs would be reviewed in design approval amendment proceedings. Design approval amendment proceedings could be initiated directly by the Commission or upon petition by any other party.

SECTION 102. EARLY SITE APPROVAL

Section 102 adds a new section which would direct the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to develop a process for approving a site before an application to build and operate a nuclear plant is filed. Site approval would be utilized in subsequent NRC licensing proceedings. Under existing regulations, the results of Staff's review of potential sites prior to the filing of construction applications are not binding.

Site approvals would remain valid for ten years, and could be renewed for additional ten year periods. The standards and criteria necessary to approve a site would be a matter left to Commission discretion and expertise.

SECTION 103. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATING LICENSES

Section 103 amends section 185 to provide for a license to both construct and operate a nuclear power plant. A utility would be able to obtain such a license if its application demonstrates that the utility's management is competent and that the plant will be constructed and operate in conformity with the application, the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, and the Commission's rules and regulations. The application must include an essentially complete design. Under current law, a utility litigates technical issues in a two-step licensing process. This provision would eliminate the duplication of detailed environmental and safety reviews. By eliminating this duplication, utilities will submit the information necessary for effective and meaningful public participation at the earliest phase of the licensing process before permission to construct is granted.

At least nine months before commencing operation, the utility must notify the Commission of the proposed date for commencement of operation. The public is then given an opportunity to file written objection to the commencement of operation and request a hearing. The Commission would determine whether there is good cause for hearing and who should be admitted as a party in the hearing, and designate the issues appropriate for adjudication. The standards for the issues to be designated for hearing are designed to ensure that the hearing will be used to resolve important and material disputes of fact which could not have been raised at an earlier stage in the licensing process, and not for purposes of delay.

SECTION 104. MODIFICATION OF REGULATORY REQUIREMENTS

Section 104 adds a new section which instructs the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to adopt regulations setting forth criteria to govern all additions, deletions and modifications to Commission regulatory requirements. These regulations are to require a systematic, centralized and documented review of the benefits and costs associated with proposed changes in regulatory requirements. New or modified regulatory requirements would become effective by Commission rule, regulation or order.

This provision would promote the stable and certain regulatory environment necessary to encourage the development and use of standardized designs. Predictability and consistency are prerequisites for uniformly high safety standards.

SECTION 105. FINALITY OF PREVIOUSLY RESOLVED ISSUES

Section 105 simply enables the Commission to resolve a factual dispute once, and not have to continually relitigate the same factual issue in a number of separate proceedings.●

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my esteemed colleague and friend from North Carolina, Congressman JAMES T. BROYHILL, in introducing the Nuclear Powerplant Standardization Act of 1985. This legislation responds to what I believe is an increasingly serious national problem. Some claim that nuclear power is no longer a viable option for our Nation's energy future. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL] has just pointed out, we can not afford to have this claim become fact. There are important benefits to be realized from the development and use of standardized nuclear powerplant designs.

The laws governing the licensing and regulation of nuclear power were enacted when nuclear technology was in its infancy, and we had little practical experience with nuclear reactors. Today, however, there are 86 nuclear powerplants licensed to operate in this country, and nuclear power supplies 13 percent of America's electricity needs. Nuclear power is expected to supply 17 percent of our Nation's electricity needs by the end of this decade.

Clearly nuclear power has become an extremely important energy source for America. It is equally clear that the licensing and regulatory process has not evolved and kept pace with the development of this important resource. The industry's and its regulator's resources are being diverted from important safety related work. The licensing process fails to maximize the effectiveness of public participation. Regulatory uncertainty is forcing utilities to rule out the possibility of nuclear power as a source of new generating capacity. The time necessary to build and license a nuclear powerplant doubled over the last decade and now exceeds 12 years. This exceeds the period in which demand and costs can be predicted with any degree of accuracy and, therefore, makes any rational planning impossible.

It doesn't have to be this way. Standardized designs, in addition to promoting safety, would improve the economics of nuclear powerplant construction. Standardized designs could significantly reduce the lead times necessary to plan, build, and license nuclear powerplants. The vendors and engineers who design nuclear reactors could concentrate their efforts on fewer designs. Preapproval of designs would enable safety reviews to be substantially complete before construction begins. Construction times could be halved. Reactors are built in Japan in 4 years using only 2,500 workers on a single shift schedule. Other countries, such as France, Canada, and West Germany, are forging ahead with their nuclear reactor programs utilizing standardized designs. They are able to build plants in less than 6 years and have thereby reaped substantial benefits.

Unfortunately, the uncertain and unstable regulatory environment has made the use of standardized designs in this country impossible. One significant factor contributing to regulatory uncertainty is the imposition of new or modified safety requirements without any systematic analysis of cost effectiveness or impact on overall safety. This practice hinders safety assessments, discourages the submission of design information early in the licensing process, and results in completed plants being significantly different and much more costly than originally envisioned. In the last few years, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission has required hundreds of modifications at a cost of millions of dollars. At many plants, the cost of the modifications necessitated by new regulatory requirements exceeds the original cost of plants—and have occasionally been so great that utilities decide to retire the plants rather than return them to service.

Recognizing the need for reform, both the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Department of Energy submitted comprehensive licensing reform proposals to the last Congress. Both the Senate and the House held extensive hearings on these proposals and on the need for licensing reform. Extensive testimony was received from the administration, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the utilities, and environmentalist organizations. The hearings established that the public will benefit from reforms which encourage standardization, a more effective application of industry and NRC resources, more meaningful public participation and the reduction of unnecessary costs.

To this end, we are reintroducing today the "Nuclear Powerplant Standardization Act." We believe this bill, which is identical to that which a bipartisan group of colleagues joined us in introducing last year, focuses on the legislative reforms necessary to encourage regulatory stability and the development and use of standardized designs.

This legislation would direct the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to develop a process for approving standardized designs. The design approval would be conclusive in subsequent NRC proceedings. To promote regulatory certainty, determinations made in design approval proceedings would only be modified in design amendment proceedings.

This bill would require the NRC to develop a process for approving a site before an application to build and operate a nuclear plant is filed. Site approvals would also be conclusive in subsequent proceedings.

This bill would also enable utilities to obtain combined construction and operating licenses. These combined licenses would eliminate redundant litigation and the duplication of detailed environmental and safety reviews.

Most importantly, this legislation addresses the manner in which the Commission modifies regulatory requirements. This law would require the NRC to adopt regulations setting forth criteria to govern all additions, deletions, and modifications to regulatory requirements. These regulations would require a systematic, centralized and documented review of the benefits and costs associated with all proposed changes in regulatory requirements. New or modified regulatory requirements would become effective only by Commission rule, regulation or order.

This provision would promote the stable and certain regulatory environment which is a prerequisite to the development and use of standardized designs. It will facilitate management of the nuclear reactors currently in operation, and protect the reactors now under construction from unnecessary backfits.

This legislation would also clarify the scope of hearings. The NRC would be able to resolve a factual question once and not have to consider the same question again in a different proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, Congress should respond quickly to the clear desire of the regulators, the regulated, and the people of this country and adopt legislation which encourages the development of American standardized plant designs. We believe the bill we are introducing today will do this. It is a compromise measure that draws from the strengths of the comprehensive proposals submitted by the Department of Energy and Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and responds to the concerns expressed by all parties at the hearings held on licensing reform last Congress.

Given this Nation's critical need and congressional support, we are optimistic about this bill's passage. There is almost total agreement that legislative reform is critically important. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has acknowledged that it is incapable of making the fundamental reform necessary to stabilize the regulatory environment without legislation. President Reagan strongly supports comprehensive nuclear licensing reform. Secretary Hodel recognizes the seriousness of this problem and has singled out nuclear licensing and regulatory reform as one of his top legislative priorities. In the Senate, Senator SIMPSON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation, has long supported this type of reform. For our part, there is a growing consensus in the House that the Federal Government must act if nuclear power is to remain a viable option for our future energy needs. I join the gentleman from North Carolina in asking our colleagues to carefully review this problem and invite you to cosponsor this legislation. It is urgent that we expeditiously tackle this problem in a truly bipartisan fashion.●

A CLARIFICATION OF ISSUES CONCERNING CONTESTED ELECTION IN INDIANA'S EIGHTH DISTRICT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

(Mr. MYERS of Indiana asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Speaker for taking the time this afternoon, and especially to the staff here. I shall be as brief as I can. But in the debate we just had whereby we excluded the Congressman-elect for the second time this year, there were a number of inaccuracies and inappropriate remarks made that were not accurate, and I think it cries out that these be corrected, and that it be shown today in today's RECORD that these were inaccurate statements that were made.

I cannot question why anyone would not vote to seat Mr. McIntyre. I do not have the power, nor would I if I had the power, to question the right of anyone to vote whatever way they feel in their heart and in their judgment is right here in this body. However, all the facts certainly substantiate that Mr. McIntyre was wronged today once again by this vote. The people of the eighth district of Indiana and in fact of every district in the country have been wronged by what happened today if it goes uncorrected, because the fact is that the precedent is most dangerous.

Some statements have been made today by our majority leader which I think need to be set right. I will try to be as accurate as I can, as I wrote down what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] said. He stated that thousands of votes were arbitrarily invalidated by the Indiana recount.

Now, before any vote is invalidated on a recount or on any other basis in the State of Indiana, it is not unlike any other State. There has to be a matter of law as to why these votes were invalidated. I was not present when all these votes were invalidated. As the record shows, some were—not thousands, but several thousand were, and they followed exactly the instructions by the courts in those various counties.

Under Indiana law each court and each county conducts its own recount when one is ordered in that county. In each of the counties, the 15 counties that make up the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana, they had all or part of their counties recounted. There is a recount commission operated by the courts that follows the law and follows the instructions of the judge.

That is exactly what happened here, and to say that they were invalidated arbitrarily is really flying in the face of fact and certainly questioning the integrity of each of those courts and the State of Indiana, and in that way it affects every other State here that could be similarly affected in the future.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] went on to say that multiple House precedents permit the House to continue to deny McIntyre his seat. The fact is that it is just exactly the opposite. In 82 cases where there have been questions about the election, in every one of those cases except one the Member was seated pending the investigation of the facts surrounding the circumstances, and I am going to speak about that in a moment.

The one exception where that Member was not seated again happened ironically in Indiana, in 1960, when Mr. Chambers, the incumbent Congressman, and Mr. Roush, the challenger, were both asked to stand aside, and neither was seated. But there were circumstances which it seems no one wants to bring up today. After the election in 1960, Mr. Chambers was issued a certificate of election by the then secretary of state of the State of Indiana. I have talked to that secretary of state, and he explained to me what happened.

Subsequent to that certificate being issued to the Clerk of the House certifying Mr. Chambers as the winner, there were some further examinations by both candidates, and it was found that an error or errors had been committed in the court and the canvass of that vote. Subsequently it was decided by the then Governor of the State of Indiana that Mr. Roush had been declared the winner.

The Governor took it upon himself to send a letter to the Clerk of the House certifying that the first certificate was in error and that the letter should be considered and be the authority to seat Mr. Roush.

So the House on January 3, 1961, could not determine whether to take the certificate as proof of the proper election of Mr. Chambers or take the letter from the Governor stating that Mr. Roush was truly the winner; so the House was uncertain and could not in its best judgment at that time seat either; but that was the one exception.

Every other case, Packard, other cases cited by everyone today, the designee who was properly designated and certified by election authority in the various States has been seated. This is the one exception, but just because the House acted unconstitutionally does not give us the right to continue to compound that by further unconstitutional acts.

Next, Mr. WRIGHT states:

The House Administration Committee is fair, not partisan, but will act swiftly to resolve the issue.

The question was not the integrity of the House Administration Committee. No one denies the right or privilege of this Chamber to investigate or judge as the Constitution provides. This was not the issue at all. The issue was clouded of what was really taking place here today. No one questioned that authority. No one questioned the integrity of the House Administration Committee.

What was not pointed out was that the power of the House Administration Committee is not vested in that House Administration Committee, but in the Congress, which can be transferred to the House Administration Committee, which it did under the resolution of Mr. WRIGHT, passed on January 3.

Now, I might add here that in question is section 4, the right to judge. The election is in section 5 of article I of the U.S. Constitution. Section 5 reads:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

Now, no one questions the Constitution on this, the right to judge, not to decide ahead of time, and this is what is implied by this today be the actions saying that what happened in Indiana, they did not count the votes properly. There was inconsistency from one county to the next on how they were counted.

Is that unlike any other State? Every one of us could be challenged on that basis; however, our Constitution also provides a protection against just such as this when it says also in article I, section 9: "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

Today when this Chamber says, "We don't like the way Indiana conducted its elections. We are going to change it now, months after the election in November." Is that not that ex post facto? We did not tell Indiana 2 years ago, 4 years ago, 6 years ago, that we can no longer accept your laws in Indiana, the way you choose your Congressman, the way you run your elections. We did not tell them ahead of time. We allow every State to go ahead and have its elections.

Now, section 4 does provide, and I quote from section 4 of article I of the Constitution:

The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature.

That is what Indiana has done exactly. The manner of holding elections, the places and the times, but the Congress may at any time by law, not by rules ex post facto, but by law alter such regulations, except as the place of choosing a Senator.

Again, today we have said, "Indiana, we don't like the way you held the elections."

Mr. WRIGHT went on to say:

The Indiana Supreme Court ruled inconsistently with respect to a State Legislature election and the McIntyre-McCloskey race.

Mr. WRIGHT judges that the Indiana Supreme Court has ruled wrongly in this case. Well, the fact is that a Federal district court, a judge appointed by former President Jimmy Carter, a Democrat county court, and the Indiana Supreme Court, composed both of Democrat and Republican appointees, have all unanimously upheld the actions of the Indiana secretary of state, Ed Simcox, in what he has done. He has followed the letter of the law.

Three, district Federal courts, county courts, and the Indiana Supreme Court have all said that Ed Simcox, our secretary of state, has made no mistake. No court ruling has been made to impugn the certification of Mr. McIntyre, the victor, in the election last November 6.

Now, for some reason, the membership here seemed to want to skirt away from Powell versus McCormack and the analogy is so close here. Yes, Mr. Powell, who was denied his seat in 1966, went back and got reelected. He sued not only for his seat, but for back pay.

The interesting thing is in the decision that the Court held—and they went way beyond the petition of Mr. Powell when he sued—the Supreme Court held in their decision, and I quote:

The House has no power to exclude a Member-elect who meets the Constitution's membership requirement of age, residence.

He has to have been a resident of the State in which he resides, has to attain at least the age of 25 prescribed by the Constitution, must have been a resident of the United States for at least 7 years, and have been a resident of the State from which he or she was elected at the time of election.

The Court held in that case that the only valid ground, the only basis that the House of Representatives can exclude a Member, the Court went beyond the petition by Powell.

For some reason we want to go back and say, "Oh, we excluded him because of his qualifications," but the Court said that we cannot exclude for any reason except for qualifications, gave no other out that we might exclude because we do not like the way the election was held or who the winner might have been.

Well, again I was somewhat taken today at the arguments that it was wrong to seat Mr. McIntyre today because it would impugn the right of the House Administration Committee and this House.

Again, no one has said that, and I do not think they read the resolution that Mr. MICHEL presented, because the last resolve clause in that resolution provides:

Resolved, That the question of the final right of Mr. McIntyre to his seat in the 99th Congress is referred to the Committee on House Administration.

Just what the Wright substitute did today, his resolution referred it back to the House Administration Committee; however, the proviso here, Mr. MICHEL would have taken the constitutional route, the one the courts have told us we must take in many cases of seating Mr. McIntyre pending the outcome of the House decision and right to make its investigation.

Mr. JACOBS wrote a book, "The Powell Affair, Freedom One Minus One." He wrote this book right after Adam Clayton Powell. It is very interesting. It almost should be necessary reading before we have another vote on the McIntyre-McCloskey issue, because Mr. JACOBS very appropriately stated, he quoted a number of different people. Mr. UDALL, who voted just a moment ago and was on the floor, Mr. UDALL said of the question of Powell in that discussion:

Mr. Powell appears before us today with a certificate of election which is just as good as yours or mine.

He goes on:

His people said they wanted him to be their Congressman.

Mr. UDALL goes on:

I say that this is about fair play to the people that Adam Clayton Powell represents.

He goes on to say:

They have said they want him to be their Congressman. You might not have made that choice and I might not have made that choice, but they want him.

Mr. UDALL goes on to say:

I am prepared to let him sit and vote for them until we can have a full and fair hearing.

For some strange reason Mr. UDALL changed his views today after this period of years. He did not vote to seat Mr. McIntyre, but he spelled it out just exactly as Mr. McIntyre was victimized today here.

Chuck Wiggins, a Republican from California, again citing on the Powell case, and I might add when Mr. Powell was excluded from membership, it was a bipartisan vote that excluded him. It has not been that in this case today, except there were some votes on the Democrat side said, yes, we should seat pending the outcome and Indiana's Eighth District should be represented, but it was not a majority.

Mr. Wiggins said:

An affirmative vote to seat Mr. Powell is not only legally correct, it is in the long-range interest of good government as well. To appreciate the profound impact of a negative vote as a precedent, it is absolutely necessary to divorce the question from the personality of Adam Clayton Powell.

Today we did not divorce the politics of this, unfortunately.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I could go on. There are so many precedents here, case after case of where we did the wrong thing today in not giving Mr. McIntyre a seat, giving the people pending the outcome of further investigation and not giving the people of the Eighth District representation in this body; but one might raise again from the Adam Clayton Powell case, and I quote from the decision:

Thus stated in narrow terms, the issue is whether the judging provision which was used today should be read for each House to judge qualifications that are not prescribed by the other constitutional provisions.

□ 1410

It goes on in the footnote:

The due process clause might impose certain procedural requirements on the exclusionary process. The power to exclude should also be read in light of the Constitutional prohibitions against bill of attainder and ex post facto law.

To change the rules today, 3 months after the election, is ex post facto.

Mr. Speaker, I have told Mr. McCloskey this, a Democrat whom I know really better than I know Mr. McIntyre, but I told Mr. McCloskey, and I seriously believe, and I mean this sincerely, if Mr. McCloskey had a certificate from the secretary of state, I would be arguing that he should be seated just as we should have seated Mr. McIntyre.

A wrong has been done today. We seated a Member from Idaho whose race also is in question. There have been other things charged here which have never been charged in Indiana: fraud, wrongdoing has never been charged in Indiana, could not have been, has not been brought up. But it was in Idaho. But we seated that Member because the people of Idaho gave him a certificate and he is entitled to that seat.

The people of Indiana, through its secretary of state, have given Mr. McIntyre a certificate. We have gone through the recount required by law, asked for by this House. It raised the number by which Mr. McIntyre won that election. Yet again today we have ignored the Constitution. We have ignored the rules of this House or we have bent them to fit the occasion. We have been wrong.

I yield back the balance of my time.

DEFENSE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss the Defense portion of the President's 1986 budget.

Always a controversial, difficult and emotional issue in the Congress and across the Nation, the Defense budget in these times is all of these and more.

To some, Defense and Deficit have become synonymous, To others, the amount of defense we need is measured only in terms of real growth percentages rather than in terms of people and equipment. And, there is little agreement on details even among those who agree in principal.

Already, since the budget was released Monday, there are conflicting reports even as to how large the Defense budget is and how much it has grown over 1985.

I hope sincerely not to add to that confusion. Rather, it is my intention today to touch on a few of the pertinent details of the budget, and share some thoughts as to the larger issues we face as we set about the business of working our will, as a Congress, on the document now before us.

I have seen and heard reports that the 1986 Defense bill requests 13 percent growth. I have heard 10 percent, I have heard 8 percent, and the President says 5.9 percent.

To put it in perspective, the Congress approved $291 billion in budget authority for the Defense function in 1985. The President has requested $322 billion in 1986.

Of these amounts, the most common frame of reference is to set aside the energy and other agencies portions and concentrate on the Defense appropriation and military construction bills. In 1985, these two bills amounted to $283 billion. The 1986 request is for $313.7 billion in budget authority.

For the Defense bill only, the 1985 number was $274.4 billion and the 1986 request is for $303.3 billion.

I leave it to each of you to arrive at your own percentage of real growth factoring in a 3.1 percent inflation projection in general terms.

But I do suggest that none of these comparisons of budget authority between 1985 and 1986 will approach the 10- and 13-percent figure. I further suggest the figure you are most likely to arrive at will be between 6 and 7 percent real growth in budget authority, probably closer to 7. But neither is it the 5.9 percent advertised by the Defense Department which saw fit to add further to the confusion by electing to eliminate civilian pay and fuel costs from its calculations.

The figures I have cited thus far are the requested budget authority. As for outlays, the amount the Department estimates it will actually spend in fiscal year 1986, the proposed figure is $277.5 billion. This compares with projected outlays of $246.3 billion in 1985.

Outlays are the key to the "A dollar from defense is a dollar from the deficit" school. It is outlays—the money actually paid out by Defense—which lie against the deficit. In a few minutes I will lay out the composition of these outlays. But first I would like to talk about this Defense bill and what I hear from many Members in this Congress—that because of the deficit, this bill must be cut.

Mr. Speaker, the Defense budget for 1986 can be cut and it probably will be cut. There is nothing unusual about that. In the past 20 years, there were only two occasions, in 1967 and in 1981, that Congress actually increased the budget from the President's request. For the past 4 years, we have cut an average of 4.8 percent per year from the request. From 1965 through 1980, Congress reduced the request an average of 4.1 percent per year, and those were during the days of Vietnam and the postwar era when it is generally conceded Defense suffered real damage. But these are different times with different concerns and history can only serve as a reference, not necessarily as a guide.

The overriding issue this year is the deficit. Defense must contribute more toward deficit reduction, it is said. This, despite the fact that administration and congressional reductions over the past 5 years have served to reduce outlays, and thus reduce the deficit by a whopping $156.5 billion, $58.5 billion in 1986 alone.

In fact, the 1986 outlays are $15.8 billion below the 1986 projection in the last budget submitted by President Carter, $8.7 billion below the so-called Rose Garden agreement of last year, and $2.4 billion below the concurrent resolution guidance handed down by this Congress last October 1.

All this aside, the President's budget has now come to the Congress for action. I am not going to ignore reality; many Members will look for greater cuts than the President has suggested and I have no quarrel with Congress attempting to improve on the efforts already made to include Defense in deficit reduction. But I think it is essential that the Members of this House be aware of what options we have in trying to do this. And I want my colleagues to note that if we are cutting Defense in the name of the deficit, we have to consider actions which will not just reduce the deficit this year but beyond—for the unfortunate truth is that we cannot correct the deficit in 1 year. It will not be corrected in 3 years. It is a long-term problem which requires long-term solutions.

The immediate question before us is the 1986 budget, and how to deal with that. The 1986 Defense outlays of $277.5 billion are what will contribute to the deficit this year. The hard fact about this figure of $277 billion is that in fact most of it cannot be meaningfully looked at for cuts. Of the entire $277.5 billion in 1986 outlays, $106.2 billion or 38.3 percent are from prior year appropriations. Congress can only impact on these outlays by canceling existing contracts and paying termination costs.

The largest outlays, $118.8 billion or 42.8 percent, are for men and women in uniforms. Congress can impact on these outlays by reducing salaries or allowances, or by reducing personnel, civilian and military, Guard and Reserve.

Of total 1986 outlays—those dollars that drive the deficit—18.9 percent of all outlays are generated by operations, maintenance, and procurement items requested in the 1986 bill.

To put it another way, unless we pay cancellation costs, or unless we make drastic cuts somehow in pay and allowances, those who are suggesting we make Defense the panacea for this year's deficit appear to be driving us toward the inevitable—taking 100 percent of outlay cuts from 19 percent of the outlays.

My colleagues may find this hard to believe, but the fact is that if, in the 1986 Defense budget, we were to zero the entire procurement budget, and if we were to zero the entire construction budget, the total impact on the 1986 deficit would be about $30 billion. If we went ahead and also zeroed the entire maintenance and operations budget, we would pick up another $20 billion. And we would still have 1986 outlays from Defense of $225 billion.

The unvarnished truth is that we do not have that much flexibility this year in trying to cut Defense and see an immediate and large impact on the deficit. If this is our goal, we will have to severely cut pay and allowances, operations, and maintenance.

There is a more evenhanded approach, one that balances cuts, if they are to be made, among all categories of spending. We need to take a look at the categories which, although they may have little immediate payoff, will help us deal with the long-term issue of the deficit.

We have not really done this to date. When Congress has cut the Defense budget it has made large cuts in suggestd pay increases and operations and maintenance, as compared to the procurement and research and development accounts.

Reductions in R&D and procurement contribute little to the immediate deficit reduction concerns. But reductions this year ripple out ahead for several years. This is the "bow-wave" effect we see so clearly when we look at 38 percent of all 1986 outlays coming from actions taken by Congress 3 or 4 years ago. I have to ask how long can we keep cutting pay and O&M, to the relative exclusion of procurement and R&D, and hope to ease the deficit problems in the outyears?

Clearly, there has to be some attention given to the procurement accounts in order to come to grips with the contribution of Defense spending to the deficit.

What options do we have? What we have done in the past to get at the procurement part of the budget is to resort to stretchouts. We reduce the number of systems procured this year in order to save money, and stretch the buy out into the future until the requirement is met.

The problem with this approach is, as is well known, that if you resort to stretchouts to realize immediate savings, you diminish economies of scale, increase the unit cost of the article in question, and end up spending a great amount more over the life of a procurement. We force bad management practices on the Department, and going back to the proposition that fighting the deficit is a long-term problem, all you may achieve in resorting to stretchouts, provided economies of scale are involved, is make that deficit problem considerably greater in 1988 or 1989 than projected today.

Secretary Weinberger and the Pentagon staff are optimistic on achieving economies of scale and savings through proper management. They argue that techniques such as multiyear procurement and economic production rates will, over time, save money if properly implemented. I think there is much to be said for these approaches, if handled with care. For example, the Air Force was able to cut 9 percent from its overall contract costs by using multiyear procurement for the F-16 from 1982 through 1985. Such procurement approaches will contribute to reducing Defense costs over time.

The problem with this, though, is that by leaving these planned procurements untouched in order to realize long-term savings, as DOD would like, Congress will have less flexibility in dealing with the Defense bill. If Defense cuts are to be made, and you want to achieve long-term economies, then you, of necessity, have to look for more cuts in pay, O&M, investment and the like.

There is one other option with respect to the procurement problem. If one assumes that the Defense budget, and in particular the procurement account, must be reduced; and if one wants also to maintain efficient production rates for certain programs, then another choice is to cancel selected procurement programs, while maintaining economic production in those remaining.

But canceling procurements poses its own set of problems. Contracts will be broken and termination costs must be paid. More importantly, canceling procurements reverse decisions previously reached by the administration and Congress regarding what is needed for our security. We cannot forget that once a decision has been made to procure a system, its military need has been justified as a result of countless hours of hearings and debate. The requirement for a particular system cannot vanish overnight.

I would urge my colleagues as we set out to examine all of the 1986 budget requests, to address not only the short-term 1986 deficit, but the longer term as well. This is my plea for all bills, Defense included.

Congress has been a full partner in the Defense decisions of the past. If prudent Defense cuts can be made—and they can—then they should be made, and I, for one, will work to see that they are.

We must have a credible Defense, we must view our actions in context with world events including arms control, we must not react unwisely to either emotions or hasty actions. We should not stop buying airplanes, if they are needed, because someone put $7,000 coffee makers in them. We just stop buying coffee makers—and fire some of the managers.

We must remember that there has been a bipartisan concensus that a number of goals are essential for our Nation's security. We have committed ourselves to improving the quality of life for our men and women in uniform. We have contributed in a very positive way to our forces' readiness and training. We are in the midst of substantial improvements in our conventional forces. And perhaps most importantly, we have moved to modernize our strategic forces.

The Congress has been a full partner in this effort. And we knew this would be an effort that would take many years. The Congress signed up to an ambitious Defense program with important objectives, and we should not lost sight of this.

With this in mind, we must make our reductions in Defense, not to react to some arbitrary dollar goal, but rather in terms of what is needed now, what can be deferred, and what can be done without. I don't know what those items are. We haven't yet had a hearing. But I can tell you this, I won't stand up and defend a Defense bill or any other bill unless I am confident we have done all we can to make it as tight and efficient as possible. Any Defense bill I support from this side will provide quality of life for our people, readiness of our forces and the finest, best maintained equipment consistent with sound management practices.

We will need the counsel and guidance of the Department of Defense throughout the entire budget process, for there will be tough decisions to be made on where to cut the Defense request. We will need the Department's reading of its priorities, and I would ask that in establishing them, the Department give some thought to not just this year's bill but to the future as well. We cannot restrict ourselves to actions which will only reduce this year's deficit, and have little lasting effect. And the worst possible outcome would be if by failing to include Defense in meaningful deficit reduction efforts today, we are pushed into decisions in the future which will seriously hurt our Defense efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD following my remarks, an analysis of the 1986 Defense bill prepared by my staff from material furnished by the Department of Defense.

And I would conclude only with these thoughts:

I believe it unfair to those in uniform and those in leadership positions for anyone to suggest the Department of Defense is the root cause of our problem. Our military has kept us free for over 200 years and God willing, will continue to do so.

I believe it is unfair to place great stock in outside reports of exorbitant increases in Defense percentages of growth. The American people are confused enough about our budget without further complications. We should all work to clarify the matter of budget growth.

And finally, we should all work to see to it we have an adequate Defense budget, that savings derived from Defense go to deficit reduction as they already have, and that we set quickly about the business of letting our constitutents and the world know that we will argue, and debate, and differ, but in the end, we will enact in a timely manner a Defense bill that will not break the bank, but will instead, provide the means for our military and our Government to keep us free and at peace.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE FISCAL 1986 REQUEST

OVERVIEW

As shown on the following chart, DoD requests 1986 budget authority of $313.7 billion which includes both the Defense and Military Construction bill but excludes $9.0 billion in the Energy bill for nuclear associated activities and for other activities. Totals by bill are:

For fiscal year 1986

	Billions
Defense (including transfers)	$303.3
Military construction	10.4

Comparative figures are:

FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

[In billions of dollars]

	Enacted	Requested
Defense	274.4	292.2
Military construction	8.4	10.3

Setting aside the nuclear portion of Defense, the FY '86 request is $30.9 billion over FY '85.

A 3.0% pay raise is requested starting 1 July 1985 for uniformed personnel. No pay raise is proposed for civilian employees, and a 5% pay reduction for civilians would become effective January 1, 1986.

The 1986 Budget Authority requested for Defense and Military Construction is $3.9 billion below the 1986 projection in President Carter's 1982 budget $11.1 billion below the Rose Garden Agreement, and $1.6 billion below the October 1, 1984 Concurrent Resolution.

Note.—There will also be a fiscal 1985 pay supplemental of $2.6 billion, $454 million of which is to pay the July 1, 1985 raise through September 30.

FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE BUDGET—FINANCIAL SUMMARY—BUDGET AUTHORITY AND OUTLAYS

[Current dollar amount in billions]

	Fiscal year—
	1984	1985	1986
Budget authority	$258.2	$284.7	$313.7
Percent real growth	4.4	6.9	5.9
Outlays	$220.8	$246.3	$277.5

OUTLAY OVERVIEW

The Department projects 1986 outlays of $277.5 billion broken out as follows:

	Billions	Percent of outlay
From prior year appropriations	$106.2	38.3
Pay and allowances from fiscal year 1986 bill	118.8	42.8
Operations from fiscal year 1986 bill	19.4	7.0
Investment from fiscal year 1986 bill	33.1	11.9

Assuming, therefore, that prior year appropriations will not be revisited and that pay, allowances and personnel will be approved substantially as requested in the '86 budget, outlay reductions can be impacted largely only by actions taken on the operations and investment accounts as requested in FY '86 and which outlay in '86. This totals $52.5 billion, or 18.9% of the total '86 request.

ECONOMIC ASSUMPTIONS

Adjusting for anticipated inflation, budget authority real growth is seen at 6.9% over 1985 in the bill total as requested. (DOD excludes civilian pay and fuel from its calculations and states real growth at 5.9%)

IMPACT ON DEFICIT

Because of various adjustments to Defense budgets, including Administration adjustments and Congressional action starting with President Reagan's March, 1981 budget revision and through Fiscal Year 1986, Defense and Military Construction outlays are $156.5 billion below original projections, $58.5 billion in 1986 alone. The 1986 projected outlays for Defense are $15.8 below the 1986 projection in President Carter's 1982 budget, $8.7 billion below the 1984 Rose Garden agreement, and $2.4 billion below the 1985 Concurrent Resolution guidance for all of Defense.

BUDGET RESOLUTION COMPARISON

The 1985 Budget Resolution, adopted October 1, 1984, provided Congressional guidance to Departments on 1986 budget request estimates as follows:

For 1986 defense (050) category

	Billions
Budget authority	$324.7
Outlay	288.7

The actual 1986 request, compared to the Budget Resolution of October, 1984 is as follows:

FOR 1986 DEFENSE BILL ONLY

[In billions of dollars]

	Budget authority	Outlay
Budget resolution	305.5	272.0
Request	303.3	270.0
1986 + or −	−2.2	−2.0

Thus, the Defense category request is lower than the budget resolution guidance in BA and is lower in outlay.

PERSONNEL 1986

The Personnel account is $4.5 billion larger than 1985 1.3% real growth for the following basic reasons: 3.0% pay raise starting in July, 1985 (July–September to be funded in a 1985 supplemental); 27,630 additional active forces; 47,096 additional reserve forces; PCS initiatives; Reserve training and support; G.I. Bill.

O&M 1986

The O&M account is $4.2 billion larger than 1985 3.7% real growth for the following basic reasons:

No strategic force increase
General purpose forces	+0.6
Intell and communications	+.6
Supply and Maintenance	+1.8
Training, medical and admin	+.8
Guard and Reserve	+.3
Airlift-Sealift	+.1

$1.3 billion of the O&M increase is inflation. The remainder, $2.9 billion, is program growth. Civilian pay and fuel costs are excluded by DOD in calculating real growth.

PROCUREMENT 1986

The Procurement account is $10.0 billion larger than 1985, 5.1% real growth. There appear to be no new, significant starts, but rather a program to slightly increase procurement levels of current programs. The largest single item in the budget is the $5.6 billion for the procurement of 48 B–1 bombers, the final year of procurement of 100 aircraft. The MX program is for 48 missiles at $3.0 billion.

But as can be seen from the following analysis, increases by account are caused by current, on-going programs. Of the $10.0 increase in procurement over 1985, $4.8 billion is inflation and $5.2 billion is program increase.

	Over 1985	Major factors
Army:

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The RDT&E account is $7.8 billion larger than 1985, 20% real growth with much of the increase spread across most of the line items. ICBM modernization, combining MX and "Midget Man" is at about two-thirds the 1985 level of $2.5 billion including 800 million for small mobile launchers and for small missiles R&D and $0.8 billion for MX R&D.

Space initiatives, the so-called "Star Wars" request is $3.7 billion.

Other programs contributing to the R&D increase include the Trident II missile, intelligence and communications, C–17, a new nuclear attack submarine, and Defense-wide mission support, broken out as follows:

MR. MEESE'S LEGAL FEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, we have recently read that Edwin Meese has asked the Federal Government to pay his lawyers' bills in the amount of $720,924 for 6 months' work.

His lawyers very carefully explained that they almost appear to be a little pained to be forced to accept so much money, billing him $250 an hour, but they explained that if they were to have asked for less they might have been accused of showing favoritism to Mr. Meese. And I think it is very honorable now that Mr. Meese has become more sensitive to charges of favoritism than he had previously been. He is willing to allow his lawyers to charge top dollar from the Federal taxpayer to avoid being accused of favoritism, and that degree of partriotism we do not often see.

I think many of us might want to show that or a similar type of patriotism where we might have people that we are prepared to have them bill the Federal Government on our account, but it may be $800,000 or $900,000, being a little bit more patriotic than Mr. Meese, just to avoid the question of favoritism.

But putting that aside, I thought we ought to put in perspective just what we are talking about, because this administration has had other positions on paying legal fees. For instance, they have been proposing under various legislative schemes, and I am not objecting to the Federal Government paying some legal fees for Mr. Meese, and I think some reasonable amount should be paid. I think $720,000 to two lawyers for 6 months' work is a wee bit excessive. But I am not opposed to the principle.

I am concerned by the hypocrisy of this administration. I am concerned by one more indication that they live by not even a double standard, because double understates the disproportion. It is almost an octupal standard or a dicennial standard that they ask four and five times and eight times as much for their favored few as for the average individual.

They have objected to the payment of legal fees to attorneys who bring civil rights cases, environmental cases, freedom of information cases, people who bring important lawyers to vindicate and are often found to be successful. And they do not get those fees unless they are found to be successful, people on behalf of important causes that bring fees, and this administration has said the most they should get is $75 an hour. But $250 an hour is to go, more than three times as much, to Mr. Meese's attorneys. Not for work that is inherently more difficult, although perhaps the administration wants to argue that defending Mr. Meese is a lot harder than vindicating the Freedom of Information Act. I do not think that is a part of their case. It is just an indication of plain, flat-out hypocrisy, and there is no other explanation when the administration explains or when they say when you are trying to defend against the EPA or laws against it, or when you are trying to get to the American people information they are entitled to have about their environment or their economy, when you are trying to vindicate the civil rights of women or minorities who have been affected, that we will give you a top of $75 an hour, but when one of our own gets in trouble the sky is the limit. If he needs $250 an hour or $720,000 in fees, he can get it.

There are other examples of disparities of this administration. This administration has been very upset about the Legal Services Program. They said that we should have it done for free, that the lawyers should be doing this pro bono.

Apparently the lawyers for Mr. Meese did not hear that. But I thought I ought to have a few comparisons of what the amount of money Mr. Meese is asking for would produce if it was made available to the Legal Services Corporation.

For instance, Mr. Meese's lawyers are asking for 6 months' work on behalf of Mr. Meese more than the Legal Services budget for fiscal year 1985 for South Dakota, for Nevada, for Montana. No, I take it back. They have got more in Montana. They are $9,000 ahead. But also for New Hampshire, for Vermont, and for Delaware. They get almost exactly the amount as North Dakota.

Our friend from North Dakota, who will be talking a little bit later about this, and I am sure the people that he represents will be happy to know that Mr. Meese gets for 6 months as much as is given to the entire State of North Dakota for a full year to vindicate the elderly, the poor people.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to my friend from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman indicates that the legal bill that is going to be passed on to the taxpayers of the country by Mr. Meese and his lawyers is something over $700,000. If you paid a lawyer $100 an hour, which is a pretty good wage in some parts of the country, that amounts to 7 work years. I wonder if anyone could explain to the taxpayers of this country how it took 7 work years by lawyers paid $100 per hour to defend Mr. Meese. It seems to me that somebody is getting ripped off here. My guess is that it probably the American taxpayer.

□ 1420

Mr. FRANK. Well, my friend from North Dakota, he could be excused from making one slight error, they get $250 an hour. I mean we are not talking the North Dakota farmers, nor North Dakota teachers, or even North Dakota lawyers; we are talking about Ed Meese's friends. And for them, and let it be clear, they did not necessarily want to do this, they did not want to show favoritism to Ed Meese. If they had taken $75 or even $100 an hour no doubt some of the partisans would be up here saying "Shame, shame, you only charged Ed Meese $100 an hour for the Federal Government to pay. We insist that the Federal Government pay $250 an hour to vindicate Mr. Meese."

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If you would yield once again, I understand we are being billed at the rate of $250 an hour. That is an outrageous amount. I used $100 an hour as a more reasonable figure to estimate the number of work-years required to defend Mr. Meese.

Mr. FRANK. I appreciate that. Seven work years, I do not know, I guess Mr. Meese's affairs may have been in worse shape than I had feared if it took that amount of time to try to make something out of it. But apparently Mr. Meese had more legal trouble, I will say this to my friend from North Dakota, Mr. Meese had apparently more legal trouble than all of the poor people of North Dakota—no, he tied that. In 6 months he got into as much trouble as all the poor people, the elderly people, the people, the people who had problems with their landlords, people who had problems with the utilities, people who were too poor to get a divorce, they got $300 more than Mr. Meese for the whole year. So I want to congratulate the gentleman from North Dakota because you have the most law-abiding, least litigious State out there. You can live on the poor people's legal bills for the entire year on what it takes one Attorney General of the United States 6 months of trying to stay out of the slammer. I want to congratulate the uprightness of your people.

I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I think he is making a very important point that we should all talk about. Obviously I come from Colorado and I was fascinated in comparing Colorado's Legal Services Corporation fees with the Meese fees. Colorado is a larger State than North Dakota, as you probably know, and our fees for the entire State came out to be about three times what his services' bill was for his one person. But instead of serving three people, since it was three times his bill, we served 25,000.

So I find that really interesting. I think another fascinating thing, you know, several of our cities were way, way, way below his entire bill and when I look at what our Legal Services Corporation people were doing in Colorado, they were writing briefs, they were appearing in court, they were doing all sorts of things, and as far as I am aware there were not a lot of briefs written for Mr. Meese or a lot of court appearances under which there was a lot of pressure.

I would like to know exactly what they did. Has anybody seen the time sheets? Have they been released? Do we know, were they billing for more than one person? If you divide that out, that is really incredible.

Mr. FRANK. My understanding is there were two lawyers involved, other than they had some legal research; they also billed for some time trying to explain the case, as I understand it. There was what might appear to be a public relations problem.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to first of all commend the gentleman from Massachusetts for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and to join my colleague from Colorado in being concerned with the double standard that we seem to see here. As I understand it, Mr. Meese has been one of the people most active in this administration in suggesting that poor people do not really need to have the Federal Government spending money in order for them to get representation; that in fact the private bar would be more than willing to provide the services if only the Federal Government would stop meddling and send it back in.

I was wondering whether we had any indication from Mr. Meese as to whether he thought this was the kind of approach in terms of fees that we would get from the private bar in exchange for service to low-income people.

Mr. FRANK. Well, we have not had any indication. If this is what we were going to be billed, we would be in trouble. But they anticipated that because as my friend knows, this administration proposed legislation sponsored by the gentleman from New York, the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. FISH, which would have limited what private attorneys could get reimbursed from the Federal Government to $75 an hour, less than one-third of the $250 an hour. So apparently we have here a simple assertion, a very simple assertion that nothing is too good for Mr. Meese but as far as the rest, these little trivia things like Environmental Protection Act, Civil Rights Act, Freedom of Information, those need not be defended with the same vigor or the same expertise.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. If the gentleman will yield further, as I understand it, both the House and the Senate in the closing days of the end of the last Congress, the 98th Congress, renewed a piece of legislation called the Equal Access to Justice Act which had as its purpose providing the little guy with some protection when the Federal Government might inappropriately either sue him or have to be sued in order for the law to be obeyed, and that law had been in effect for several years.

In our committee hearings we had been told it worked rather well at insulating people from inappropriate Government action. The general fee provision then was $75 an hour.

Now, after we renewed that bill I understand that President Reagan chose to veto that bill when we were no longer in session; therefore killing that extension.

It seems like another example of "nothing is too good for Mr. Meese but the average American does not have much protection."

Mr. FRANK. I am glad the gentleman has pointed that out because we do not want to be unfair. This administration says we sometimes unfairly accuse them of picking on the poor. They are not just picking on the poor, they are picking on the small business and middle-class people too because, as the gentleman points out, up until recently there was a law that said that if you are a small business man, small business person, and you are inaccurately and unfairly accused of violating the National Labor Relations Act or the Occupational Safety and Health Act or some other act and you have to defend yourself and you are proven innocent after a proceeding, then you would get a reimbursement at $75 an hour as the gentleman has pointed out, your lawyers' fee would be reimbursed.

This administration vetoed that. So we now have a situation where the only person in the country who can get vindicated and then get legal fees along with the vindication is Mr. Meese. If you are a grocer accused of violating the law or a small business man, Ronald Reagan vetoed it. The extraordinary degree of hypocrisy here impresses me.

The gentleman is right. If you are at the Legal Services Corporation, then Mr. Meese's lawyers for 6 months get more money than the entire State of Vermont, almost as much money, exactly the same as the entire State of North Dakota, one-third as much as the entire State of Colorado. If you are a small business man you get nothing at all. If you are a citizen who is forced to bring a lawsuit to try to vindicate an important national policy, you might get a third of what these people get. I do not understand that.

I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I had a question about that. Maybe we are being unfair. Do we know if Mr. Meese's attorneys are doing a lot of volunteer work for the Legal Services Corporation? Are they taking a lot of cases for the poor?

Mr. FRANK. I would say to the gentlewoman I do not know. I do know they are people of some probity because they volunteered that to us, that painful although it may be to accept $720,000 for 6 months' work for the two of them on behalf of Mr. Meese, which would come out I would think to $360,000 apiece for 6 months, and an annualized fee of $720,000 a year, but they have secretaries, they have secretaries who may make as much as $20,000, $25,000, $28,000 a year, they have a little rent, some electricity on the machine. So this is not pure profit, this $720,000; probably not more than 70 to 80 percent of it goes into their pockets.

The point, however, is that they did not necessarily want to take this. But they were afraid that if they did not accept, if they accepted $100 an hour as our friend from North Dakota thought might be a reasonably generous reimbursement for lawyers, reflecting no doubt the popular orientation that endears him to the people of North Dakota but makes them suspect in the law firms of Washington, but this $100 an hour, they could not accept $100 an hour because they do not want to show Mr. Meese favoritism. They are honorable and upright people. They insisted in fairness and in justice to Mr. Meese that he should not be shown favoritism, that they should get $250 an hour; a rare degree of fidelity to the public interest from what we see these days.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Very touching, does the gentleman think?

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentlewoman. I thank my friend from Connecticut.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that we include in the RECORD at this point an article published in the Winston-Salem, NC, Sentinel, again a newspaper too far removed perhaps from our great metropolises to understand why lawyers need $250 an hour in this instance. It is an article in the United Press International wherein a legal services lawyer said his group provided services for 1,600 people per year for a little more than the $720,000 Mr. Meese wants for his defense in the special investigation. It quotes Terry Roche, Executive Director of the Legal Services of Southern Piedmont in Charlotte, NC. I ask this be included in the RECORD.

The article follows:

AID LAWYER: MEESE'S FEES EQUAL 1,600 POOR CLIENTS

WASHINGTON.—A legal services lawyer says his local group provides lawyers for 1,600 people for little more than the $720,924 Edwin Meese wants taxpayers to pay for his defense in a special prosecutors investigation.

Terry Roche, executive director of the Legal Services of Southern Piedmont, based in Charlotte, N.C., said his group served 1,600 new clients last year on a budget of $740,000. Meese, a White House counselor whom President Reagan has nominated for attorney general, is seeking $720,924 from taxpayers to pay for the cost of his lawyers, court records show.

"If Ed Meese is worth 1,600 poor people, that's a value judgment that I think is fairly typical of this administration," Roche said in a telephone interview yesterday.

"It strikes me as extraordinary overreaching . . . that this administration says it is interested in the problems of equal access to justice on behalf of poor people and they want to equate Ed Meese's problems to that of 1,600 poor people," he said.

Meese, 53, was nominated last year to succeed William French Smith as attorney general, but Senate action was put on hold while a special prosecutor, Jacob Stein, investigated and cleared him of any criminal wrongdoing in connection with his financial and personal dealings.

Meese, a former California prosecutor, has asked a court for the money to pay his lawyers for successfully defending him.

Meese's lawyers charge as much as $250 an hour, but in his petition to a three-judge court, the lawyers said the law permits the payment of the fee. Stein received only $75 an hour for his role.

Roche said his agency's $740,000 budget for 1985 will include $622,722 from the Legal Services Corp. His group provides lawyers for the poor in five counties.

He estimates that it costs $63,000 to $65,000 to pay the salary, benefits, secretary, overhead, paralegals and supervision for each of his lawyers. Each lawyer earns $21,000 a year plus benefits.

Reagan and Meese have both opposed having government pay legal services for the poor.

A National Law Journal study of legal fees found that the Legal Services Corp. is on occasion willing to pay more for lawyers. It hired a prominent Washington law firm to battle a unionization move among the agency's staff and, in the last year, the law firm billed the corporation $164,451.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

FAMILY FARMERS IN DEEP TROUBLE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to talk a bit about agriculture. In the heartland of this country, the family farmers are in some deep trouble, and there has been a lot of discussion around this town about what ought to be done about it.

Just last evening, at the microphone behind me, the President came and addressed the House, and reiterated that we ought to phase out farm price supports. That is the direction we ought to head, according to President Reagan. That is the solution he feels would be appropriate for the family farmers.

We have others who feel that family farmers are not in trouble at all. There is quite a difference of opinion among various policy makers in this town, and today I want to describe what I see as the problem in rural America and talk about some of the potential solutions.

Probably as much as anybody in the House, I know something about rural America. I graduated in a high school class of 9, on the outskirts of a town of 350. My family raised cattle and horses. I grew up in rural America.

I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. You had a good chance to be at the top of your class, then, with a class of that size.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The gentleman makes a good point. I usually point out I was in the top five; somewhere in the top five of those nine.

The gentleman from Iowa has about the same orientation as I do, coming from a small rural area of this country and understanding what farming is all about. It gives us a different perspective about the importance of family farmers and how we ought to solve some of their problems.

I have discovered here in Washington, DC, that there is a lot of discussion about defense. Everybody talks about the security of America and the defense of the country. I do not know of one person who served in the U.S. House of Representatives who has ever said, "I'm against defense, or "I'm against security," or "I'm not for a strong America."

Nor do many in the House take the time to describe to the President and others the notion that security and defense is more than building a bullet or an MX missile or a Trident II missile or another battleship.

Security is also depending on our ability to feed ourselves, and feed part of the rest of the world. We are a major industrial giant and a major military power, and we also have the ability to produce food in great abundance for the rest of the world as well as feed ourselves. That is part of our security as Americans.

Farming is part of our security and our strength. Viewed from that perspective, we come to different conclusions about the value of family farmers. There is the old phrase around town that is often used to describe David Stockman—he "knows the cost of everything but the value of nothing."

I do not know whether that is accurate or not, but I do know that Mr. Stockman's description of the farm plight and his proposed remedies are out of step with the needs of this country and the needs of the family farmers.

I would like to describe the trouble. Unlike any other business person, family farmers produce a product, spending a lot of money to produce early in the year without knowing how much money they will get for it until well into the end of the year.

They buy feed; they buy seed; they buy fertilizer; they buy petroleum; and they use it to put some crops in or feed some livestock. Later in the year, at harvest time, if grasshoppers have not come and if it has not rained too hard or too little and if it has not hailed and if they have not had blight, they will harvest.

The price at harvest depends on the international grain markets. Sometimes when harvest comes the international grain price goes down and stays down. What they put in that spring is not worth much in the fall. They are going to lose a lot of money those years, if they are lucky enough to grow a crop.

Hardware store owners know the price of a pair of pliers when they buy from wholesalers. The price will not change much when a consumer buys them.

A bushel of wheat, on the other hand, might be priced at $5 and it might be priced at $1.80, and the farmer does not know when he plants. The farmer does not know when he plants wheat whether it will grow, and if it grows whether it will be destroyed along the way before harvest.

That is why a farmer faces such a completely different situation than almost any other business person. Now, for the first time in many decades, farm prices have gone down and stayed down over an extended period of time. At the same time interest rates have gone up and stayed up.

Farmers are heavy users of credit because there is nobody to hand them a paycheck in March or April when they want to put the crop in. They have to borrow some money in order to put the crop in.

Interest rates remaining as high as they have remained have been terribly detrimental to our family farmers. High interest rates and low prices whipsaw farmers so that many family farmers cannot possibly stay in business. They just cannot make it.

The question facing us is, do we want a network of family farmers in the country? Does anybody care? Should we care?

Abraham Lincoln decided in the mid-1800's that we ought to have a U.S. Department of Agriculture. USDA has been around for 120 years. Back in the thirties we decided to support prices and use farm programs to help family farmers. We knew then that every time there is a steep price decline, family farmers get washed away with the tide.

Many people felt, then that it is important to have a network of family farms producing on the prairie. Some of us still do.

My district is all of North Dakota. I was home last weekend, as I am many weekends, and I had the opportunity to fly over the State at night. When you look out the airplane windows, you see 40,000 yard lights in North Dakota, 40,000 yard lights that each represent a family farm, each an economic unit that becomes a network of economic blood vessels that allows the small towns to survive.

It is estimated about 5,000 of those yards light will be turned out in the next 15 to 18 months. As each of those yard lights is turned out, then each of those small communities that rely on those farms for their economic well-being begins to decay and die.

If we do not maintain a network of family farms, if we decide not to care, we consign rural America to a much different life than most of us think rural America ought to have.

Japan cares about its farmers. Japan decided it needed a network of family farmers, and they are protecting them. West Germany does the same. America now has a President who doesn't see the need, and doesn't seem to care.

The 1 million farmers now in desperate trouble in this country have individual names. Their names in my part of the country are Scandanavian, the Larsons and the Olsens and the Christiansons, and German, the Schmidts and the Schmaltzes. They are individual names, individual families operating a family business called a family farm.

If they had been consolidated into a corporate entity under one name called Lockheed or Chrysler or Continental Illinois or even the Government of Mexico, or something called the IMF, if they were big enough to come to this Congress as one entity, the response would be different. I am convinced the President would say: "Can we help? Is there anything we can do?"

We would run to the public medicine chest to see how to help big enterprises. We have done it in the past and we will do it in the future.

And this is helping the wrong kind of institutions.

What ought we do? We need to do a couple of things right at the moment. We have many family farms owned by young people, in the most serious trouble. These are the people that started farming in the last 5 to 10 years; they have a little heavier debt load because they couldn't buy farmland without having an 80-percent debt load these days.

These farmers have a heavier debt load, with higher interest rates, and they are in trouble. If we want to save any of those folks, we need some short-term debt restructuring.

We can do that. Some of us have put a bill in the House today; we are going to have a press conference about that in the morning describing our legislation. We need to pass a short-term debt restructuring bill. We can do this without costing the Government a lot of money, and it will save many family farmers.

□ 1440

We also need to look at new markets. Let me give my colleagues an example of some markets I think we can serve that we do not now serve at all. One is very exciting. It is barter. The old-fashioned notion of trading something we have for something someone else has.

The Agriculture Minister of a Sub-Saharan African country came to this country not too long ago and he said, "You know, we have something called pyrethrum flower." Something I had never heard before. It is used in its crushed form as an insecticide for rice. They said, "We have got a surplus of pyrethrum flower and we would like to trade you some of that and get wheat in return."

We have a need in our strategic stockpile for pyrethrum flower, and we have grain bins bulging with wheat. We ought to say, "Sure, we will take the pyrethrum flower. We will ship you some wheat."

This administration thought different. USDA said, "No, we do not barter. We don't have a barter program."

They are right. We do not have a barter program. We had one under Dwight David Eisenhower which started in the 1950's and went to 1973. We bartered over $6 billion worth of goods. But this administration does not believe in it. Barter is worthwhile and useful. The free market will not do by itself. Many governments want to arrange barter transactions with us. We have caves near Kansas City, MO, filled with surplus dairy products.

One cave alone contains 3,000 train carloads of nonfat dry milk. We ought to barter that non-fat dry milk overseas to countries that want it, but that have no currency with which to pay for it. In return we'd take from them bauxite, titanimum, chromium, and dozens of items that they have and we need for our strategic stockpile. Barter is one approach that would work to our advantage. I would like this administration to begin supporting barter. It would be good for the farmers and it would be good for America.

The second approach to opening markets is to extract alcohol from excess grain products and develop a significant ethanol alcohol industry. It makes good sense to extract alcohol from corn and still have the protein feed stock left. This would be a good new market for corn. It is good for our energy independence. It is good for farmers because it is a new market.

Those are the kinds of things we should try. Unfortunately, nobody in the White House or at the Department of Agriculture cares to lead. I do not mean to be hard on the President. He is a good fellow. I am sure he feels that he is trying to do the right thing. But he is letting David Stockman be the principal spokesperson for agriculture, and is not doing anything favorable for the American farmer.

We need a strong Agriculture Secretary who knows where and how to move for the interests of the family farmer and for the interests of this country.

We can build a price support bridge for family farmers so that when prices decline in the international grain markets, they are protected from the valleys. We can do that without spending another nickel over today's expenditure if we layer in stronger price supports for family farm products only up to a certain level of production. That will immediately give some help and relief to family farmers, and it will give them an opportunity to make a decent profit if they are good farmers. We could do that without spending another nickel more than today.

Today's agricultural expenditures go all too often to the big shots that do not need them. They produce the most and need the support the least. Why should we give $2 million to Texaco's corporate farm? Why should we give $2 million to a big insurance company's corporate farm? Why should we support the price of every gallon of milk produced by someone who milks 3,000 cows?

Let us turn this thing back around and use our money to provide price supports to the family farm units who need it. We must maintain the strong network of family farms that I think contribute to the security of this country.

The other day I was thinking about a song I heard several years ago by Tom Paxton. The name of the song is, "I'm Changing My Name to Chrysler."

Mr. Paxton sings, "If you are a corporate titanic and your failure is gigantic, down in Congress there is a safety net for you."

I think that is instructive. There are many very large economic interests that have come to this Congress, from foreign governments to corporations. Congress always says, "Well, you are too big to be allowed to fail." We have 11 banks in this country that our Government will not allow to fail.

I don't think we ought to allow those 11 banks to fail. But if these institutions are now part of no-fault capitalism, we should think about what this means for the country bank that is allowed to fail.

Congress ignores economic parity in this country, and it shouldn't. We have a million family farmers with individual names in serious trouble. I am asking that we give the same consideration to the combined economic impact they provide to the economy that we would give were those farmers incorporated under one single corporate name. Those folks need a lot of help and we have got to give it to them soon if we are going to save many of those farmers.

Those of us who represent farm districts have been to farm auction sales and farm forums and have talked to farm families. We know that we are not just talking here about statistics. We are talking about people who are farming a quarter section or half section or full section of land that their grandfather farmed, and their father and mother farmed. The farm has been passed to them. I recall at a farm forum a big strapping fellow who stood up and described how that farm had been passed down in his family. He said, "We work hard. We don't go out on weekends. We don't buy new pickup trucks. We work as hard as we can work. My grandfather and grandmother farmed this place. My mother and father did. Me and my wife have been doing it for 8 years and we held the auction sale a couple of months ago because we couldn't make it."

He had tears in his eyes in front of a couple of hundred other farmers. It was his life. It was not just a business. It was his entire life. There was not any way, given the economic conditions today of low prices and high interest rates, that a family farmer could continue in his situation. If this country does not care about that, then it is very shortsighted.

If it does care about that, then it has got to get off the dime and begin doing something meaningful to change it.

The Secretary of Agriculture has announced a new credit program. I heard someone the other day say, "Well, he is moving in the right direction." It is the right direction. What value is it, though, if you creep in the right direction so slowly as to not be able to measure any progress?

We need to see leadership in the right direction, at the right time, with the right help. That is what is important. And we are not seeing it from the administration.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly appreciate greatly the leadership he has shown in this issue.

I would hope that the people of the country would realize what he is trying to say. He is trying to say that this is not just a problem for that farmer who is going broke—whose story breaks your heart, as it does mine. He is trying to say, I think, this is a national problem and that somebody better wake up to realize that if the heartland of America fails, it is going to be equally devastating to our country if Chrysler were to fail or if New York City were to face similar problems.

I believe our urban Members should realize how this problem came to be. The fact is that what has happened over recent years is that the value that the farmers get from the products they produce has constantly gone down. That has occurred at the same time that their costs of inputs have constantly gone up. It has also occurred at the time when interest rates have gone from 7 percent to 14 percent.

□ 1450

It is not surprising that that would cause these types of troubles.

So now what do we have the Department of Agriculture proposing should be done?

They propose that, whereas there has been some support and some help for our farmers, we should change the support that they get.

Let me read you what their proposals are. At this time we have a support price, a target price, of $3.03 for corn and a loan rate of $2.55 for corn. I might tell you that the figures show that the cost of production is $2.56, which is higher than the loan rate even at this time.

Let me just tell you what they propose to do with the loan rate over that period: 1985, $2.55; 1986, $2.12; 1987, $1.90; 1988, $1.80; 1989, $1.72, and 1990, $1.75. The target price at that time will be $1.86 in 1990.

Is there somebody here who, first of all, thinks that the cost of production is going to go down between 1983 and 1990 for almost anything we produce? Is there anybody here who thinks that the cost of production of $3.56 today to raise a bushel of corn that our farmers are going to do fine with support prices of $1.86 or $1.75 for something that today costs $3.56 to produce? That is the proposal that is being offered to us from the Department of Agriculture.

And they say, "Well, we have to do this because our programs have not worked right in the past." I agree that we have had problems with our program in the past, and we cannot argue that.

I guess the question is, when you have something that is not working, do you try then to recognize the problem and address the problem, or do you say that since that does not work you are just going to jerk the rug right out from under all of the farmers and let them suffer whatever comes from it?

They say, "We are not able to compete in world markets."

I am here to tell you that the world production has been increasing significantly on agricultural products. It is quite clear that world production is increasing more rapidly than makets are increasing. Secretary Block told us just the other day, and I quote him exactly, he said, "World demand has collapsed in our face." That is correct. Is there somebody here who thinks that it is perfectly proper for us to say to our farmers now, when we face this problem, "We are going to pull the rug out from under you, and even though foreign countries subsidize their agriculture to a very great extent, we are going to say that we expect you to all of a sudden now to compete with them on unsubsidized agriculture, where you just have to compete"?

They talk about a free market. I am here to tell you that the market is not free. We are competing in areas where there is not a free market, by any means.

And I guess the issue we have to face goes further than that, and I guess the issue we have to face is not just for those farmers that Mr. DORGAN and I talked to and who literally tear you apart as you hear their story—the issue we have to face is: Do we have a Government that is concerned with what happens in our society? Do we have a Government that is supposed to try to do what it can to keep economic order within our country?

I supported the loan for New York City. I supported the loan for Chrysler. I think we should have done that. But to say that it is important for us to see the Chrysler lives and that New York City survives, and then say that it does not matter about the heartland of American seems to me to be awfully narrow thinking.

Mr. Stockman has said that he felt that a farmer who owned, say, 200 acres of land that was worth over $1,000 an acre should not be expecting welfare because he had a value of some quarter of a million dollars.

Let me tell you, that is true, that was true at one time; but that farmer, as Mr. DORGAN has already pointed out, is now broke. He does not have a quarter of a million dollars of worth just because he has a farm that has been in the family for years and years and years. First off, that farm has declined in value by about 50 percent in my area in the last 3 years. And second, he has got a big mortgage against it. Do you think that farmer would be declaring bankruptcy and getting out of farming if he did indeed have that net worth?

So we talk about welfare and whether we are going to give the farmers welfare or not. Let me read to you the list of giant corporations and what tax rate they are paying, if we want to talk about welfare:

General Electric, profits from 1981 to 1983, $6.5 billion. They received a refund from the taxpayers of America of $283 million.

Boeing, $1.5 billion. Refund, $267 million.

Dow Chemical, $776. Taxpayers paid them back $223 million.

I can go on: Tenneco, Weyerhaeuser, Du Pont, Martin Marietta, General Dynamics, Union Carbide, Dun and Bradstreet, RCA, Texaco, Celanese, Greyhound, Burlington Northern, Ashland Oil, Singer Co., W.R. Grace, American Cyanamid, on and on. If you take the 65 companies with profits of

$49,500,000,000, their effective tax rate averaged minus 6.5 percent. The taxpayers gave them $3,232,000,000 in that period.

So we feel that it is important to try to subsidize those companies, but we feel that farming, which is so important to the heartland of America, should not expect help from our Government. I think it is about time we get our perspectives straight here. I think if we are going to have a Government that operates the way it ought to, then we all ought to be concerned about not just the General Electrics and the Du Ponts and the Boeings, and so on. We ought to be concerned about our whole society.

It seems to me that it is pretty silly for us to have to be fighting with Dave Stockman and this administration to try to bargain with them to get them to do something about a major problem that exists in our society. I should think that they would be concerned about that problem. I thought that was what they were elected to try to do. And I would hope that at least some of the people who are hearing this conversation and some of the other things that we are trying to do would start to realize what the purpose of Government is and would start to recognize their responsibility and decide that they want to work together with the rest of us to address the problem that I think is vitally important to our total country.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. No one that I know of has ever suggested that the American farmer is losing his or her edge. The American family farmer is the best; if you look at agriculture around the world. This is not bragging. Our farmers are the most productive farmers in the history of civilization.

Why is it, then, if we have the most productive farmers in civilized history, that they are going broke?

It is not because the men and women out there on the farms are doing the wrong things. It is because a lot of things are hurting them that they can't control.

There are a couple of things that have happened to family farmers. It was wrong for Carter to have an embargo. It was wrong, in my judgment. But he just did; Nixon and Ford did. Reagan dragged his feet in extending the long-term agreement with the Soviets. We have always had interruptions with the market, under Democratic and Republican administrations. It is time we stop meddling in those markets. We need to let the farmer serve those markets, and have no more embargoes. And budget deficits are terrible for farmers.

Farmers probably suffer more than any other industry in America because of Federal budget deficits. When the President said yesterday, "I would like for you to spend $180 billion more than you take in," that adds to the Federal debt, and it means we move even deeper into the credit markets to borrow funds for the Federal Government. That puts upward pressure on interest rates. It makes the American dollar more attractive to foreign investors, which drives up the value of the dollar. In effect, it puts a 35-percent surtax on everything the American farmer wants to sell overseas.

The American farmer is troubled greatly and endangered by these budget deficits. They cannot control the budget deficits. Congress can and the President can. But this President says, "I would like to change the U.S. Constitution to prevent any deficits." Of course, at the same time he sends us a budget which says, "I want Congress to spend $180 billion more than you take in."

Well, what kind of leadership is that?

This Congress is not able to resist that. There is not a lot of difference between conservatives and liberals between how much money they want to spend. They want to spend it for different things. You know, if you are a conservative, you still want to spend all that money, you just want to spend it on an aircraft carrier or a new jet fighter. And if you are a liberal, you want to spend it on milk for a feeding program.

There is not a lot of difference on how much money they want to spend. There is a difference on whether or not to spend it on defense or on domestic programs, but the impacts are the same on the family farmer. They are devastating. And the farmer cannot control that. Our grain bins bulge, our caves are full of nonfat dry milk and cheese, far more than we can consume, while there are millions around the world dying because they do not have enough to eat.

□ 1500

Nineteen million children today will be fed by CARE, a voluntary relief organization under Food for Peace. Each child will get a ration of 80 grams of grain and 10 grams of oil.

You could fit that ration in a half-full waterglass.

That ration is the only thing between those children and death. Nineteen million get that ration, but many do not. Many of these children will starve. Forty-five thousand children will starve today, tomorrow, and every day in the foreseeable future until we learn to deal with the problems of hunger and its related causes.

This is the paradox. There is an incredible need for what we produce around the world; but while people starve, Congress debates about whether or not to get rid of many farmers by phasing out the farm programs. There is a tremendous demand out there, and we ought to figure out innovative ways to serve it.

We can successfully complete with the Soviets bullet-for-bullet and gun-for-gun in every country in Central America. We just move weapons down there. I have been up in the mountains, in the Contra camps and so on, and we move weapons down there and we can send as many or more than the Soviets can. But what they need most desparately down there is something to eat. They do not need more guns or more bullets; they need something to eat.

People are literally starving in Central America. Seventy-five percent of the people of Honduras are at nutritional risk. They need something to eat. The Soviets cannot provide it because the Soviets cannot even feed themselves. Why do we not outcompete the Soviets in areas they cannot possibly win? The Soviets cannot possibly win if we begin helping people with what they need most. It is something we have in great abundance: Food. The Soviets cannot feed themselves and they surely cannot feed other hungry people around the world.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. The gentleman from Iowa has done a great deal of work previous to when I came to Congress in regard to management and even taught management schools. One of the things they teach you in management is that you build on your strengths. If the United States is going to do that as we compete with the Soviet Union, it seems quite clear to me that our strength is our economic system and how it works and our ability to produce in that economic system. For us to simply say we are going to throw that away and we are going to compete not there but we are going to compete trying to build more bombs and missiles and this sort of thing, it seems to me the height of absurdity.

If those Central American countries or any other countries have any sense at all, they would want to be in our sphere of influence because of what our economy can do to help them with their economies. If we have any sense, we would make it clear to them that this is where we want the competition to be; we want to cooperate with them, and we want to help them to build their economies. If we do, my contention is that the Soviet Union will be clear out in left field, we have no worry at all, and we are absolutely asinine to say that we are going to compete on the terms where the Soviet Union has the greatest opportunity because their system will let them put everything that they want to into the military area of their society, and they simply cannot compete with us in terms of our total economic help that we could give.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. That is well said. If you look back 100 years from today to this time we would see a group of people who decided to take their most productive and useful assets and tried to make them less productive. People in the future will scratch their heads. They won't be able to say why a group of people would do that. Our most productive assets are our food-producing assets: Our land, our people, our family farms. It makes no sense at all to make them less productive.

Public policy for American agriculture is knotted up. We have to untie it. We have to untie it in a way that gives family farmers a chance to make a decent profit, and a chance to live a life that contributes to the rural societies we have known and should know in the future of this country.

This is not a selfish statement from those of us from the Farm Belt. We say it because we firmly believe it is in the best interests of this country to maintain a strong network of family farms.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. If we are going to do that, which this gentleman agrees with, then I think we also have to recognize that the most efficient type of production we have in our country comes from our small businesses. Most all of our creativity comes from small business. Practically all of our job creation comes from small business.

Small business is tremendously important to rural America. So what are we doing as a society? I just told you what we are doing for the taxes of the big corporations. I am telling you if you are a small business, you do not get that type of a tax refund, you have to pay taxes. So now what else are we recommending? We are recommending that we completely eliminate the Small Business Administration. Somebody said, well, we do not need it, because most small businesses, I think it is 70 percent of small businesses, have not ever used it. To me, that is sort of like saying since most people do not have cancer we should not worry about it, because most people do not have cancer.

It seems to me we should help those who can use the help and help our society. For us to say what we want to do is move away from small business to big business; away from family farming to corporate farming, seems to me to be the height of folly. I would hope we would realize what we are doing.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I recall a committee hearing a couple of years. We heard from someone who was in charge of antitrust policies. He said, "If America contained 100 corporations doing all of its business and each had 1 percent of the business, that would represent perfect competition and would not pose a real problem for him." This was the chief antitrust enforcer of the Federal Government.

I recall that we were incredulous when talking with him. We could not understand how he had grown up with such a lack of knowledge about America and what this country means. He didn't understand the importance, in America, of the ability to start your own business and grow and prosper and succeed and fail.

Many people are now expressing those same notions about agriculture. What they miss, I think, is part of the philosophy that Thomas Jefferson described many years ago. Thomas Jefferson warned against concentration and its dangers. Concentration in the economic sector and concentration in the public sector. Big is not always bad, but big can often be stifling and bureaucratic, and big can often restrict freedoms.

Thomas Jefferson used to talk about the need, if we are going to retain political freedom in this country, to have broad-based economic ownership. Economic freedom translates to political freedom. Economic freedom comes from family farms and independent businesses represented by broad-based economic ownership of America. That is another reason why family farms and independent businesses are so critical to this country of ours. It has to do with economic freedom and political freedom.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Just very shortly. The exact quote that was made to us in that regard was, and I quote:

> I see nothing written in the sky that this world would not be a perfectly satisfactory place if there were only 100 corporations.

I think the gentleman from North Dakota and I do not want to see a world in which there are only 100 corporations, and I would hope the people of America would not want to see that. Further than that, we had testimony before our committee by people from this administration who, where the issue was whether or not we should let big corporations borrow money at lower interest rates than small corporations.

My question to them was: If this could be shown that it was discriminatory against small business, would you consider changing your policies?" Their answer was no, that they would not. This is the problem that we face with our farmers. Until somebody starts to say that we want some fairness in our society and we are going to be concerned about what happens in our society, at the administration as well as in the Congress, I think we are going to have these difficulties. I certainly hope that it is sooner rather than later that they will come to their senses and realize the problem.

□ 1510

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. The gentleman from Iowa is correct, and I appreciate his coming down and sharing his thoughts with me.

Let me end with just two other points.

I sent other Members of Congress last week a loaf of bread. It described to people who do not come from a farm how much of the price of that loaf comes from the price of wheat. I showed on the wrapper of the loaf that the farmer gets the heel. The farmer gets 6 cents of the 81-cent price. You could increase the price of wheat without having very much impact at all on the price of a loaf of bread.

The farmer goes to town with a bushel of wheat and sells it at the elevator. On a good day today he will get $3.40. Estimates have the price heading down to about $2.80. He will pay $86 if he tries to buy that bushel of wheat back at the grocery store later on after it has been sent out to a factory and puffed up as a cereal.

Think of that; $3.40 for the wheat. It gets puffed up someplace, and it comes back to the grocery shelf for the equivalent of $86 for a bushel; $82 is for the puff, and $3 is for the wheat.

I think there are apt descriptions of why the farmers are in trouble. We need to do something for farmers, and we need to do something fairly quickly if we are going to maintain a strong network of family farms in this country.

The reason I have taken the floor today is to describe what the problem is and what some of the potential solutions ought to be. When we get back, I know the Congress will consider some bills on agricultural issues. I hope that all Members of Congress will take the time to try and learn as best they can how tough things are out in the farm country. There are decisions we can make here in Washington, DC, to provide some help so that family farmers can make a go of it.

LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE POLICY AMENDMENTS ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act, amending the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act to provide for the ratification of interstate compacts for management of low-level waste. I am also submitting to the RECORD a companion to the bill; an amendment that would be recommended to be adopted to each interstate compact for low-level waste management ratified by the Congress. This legislative package is intended to be considered in tandem with all interstate compacts introduced for ratification, which includes as of today H.R. 862, the compact for the Northwest region. Compacts for four other interstate regions were introduced during the 98th Congress, and are expected to be reintroduced this year.

In the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act [LLRWPA] of 1981, Congress invited the States to form regional commissions to develop new disposal capacity for low-level waste. We made providing for LLW disposal a State responsibility, promising that if States entered into compacts to fulfill this responsibility, we would grant them authority to manage those compacts for their own use to exclude from the sites waste from States not members to the compacts. The LLRWPA set January 1, 1986 as the earliest date on which ratified compact regions could begin excluding out-of-region waste from their disposal sites.

Since the LLRWPA was enacted, it has become apparent that States without disposal capacity already existing in their regions would not get new capacity on line by 1986. It also became apparent that the 1986 date for regional exclusivity had been accepted by States with operating sites as a deadline on access to those sites for out-of-region waste. A stalemate set in between States with disposal sites and those without: States with sites have threatened to shut them down completely if they are required to continue accepting waste from outside the region after January 1, 1986, while States without disposal capacity have imposed barriers to congressional approval of the compact authority that would assure the sited States they could legally curtail out-of-regional waste.

This is the logjam that a group of concerned Members of Congress, including Mr. DERRICK, Senator THURMOND, Senator BIDEN, and I have been seeking to break by negotiating with the States, and encouraging them to negotiate with each other. Governor Riley of South Carolina and the National Governors' Association have provided a framework for putting together a legislative proposal. Generators of low-level waste, from nuclear utilities to hospital associations, contributed to making the proposal comprehensive and realistic. The documents submitted by me today represent some ideas that seem to have received a warm reception—or at least to have been acknowledged as necessary—by these affected groups.

It has not been endorsed by any of them, and it does not, I believe, in all respects represent the best and final proposal for resolving these issues. It represents a beginning.

The most important features of the legislative package can be summarized as follows:

First, all interstate compacts submitted for congressional ratification would be subject to the same congressional agreements and legislative ratification language. Specific amendment or qualification of individual compacts are not contemplated in this approach, and would be discouraged.

Second, no substantive changes would be made to the content of compact statutes ratified by the States and submitted for congressional approval. The consent of Congress to the compacts would be based on our stated understanding, pursuant to our analysis of the compacts, that nothing in them confers new authority on the States or infringes on Federal authority.

Third, the LLRWPA made States responsible for disposal of low-level radioactive waste, and this legislative package defines specifically that material for which States are responsible. Other definitions of low-level waste for State or Federal purposes may coexist with this definition. Other radioactive wastes, with the exception of uranium mill tailings (responsibility for which is determined by the Uranium Mill Tailings Control Act), would be the responsibility of the Federal Government.

Fourth, before congressional ratification of compacts became effective, 1 year from enactment of this package, States with operating disposal capacity would have to offer to enter into agreements, under their own existing compact authority, to accept out-of-region waste for disposal, only in limited quantities and only until January 1, 1993. No requirement to accept out-of-region waste would be imposed by Congress upon a ratified compact group.

Ceilings would be placed on the amount of waste regions with operating sites would be required to accept. These ceilings are low. All waste projected to need disposal during the 1986 to 1993 period could not be accommodated. Agreement seems to exist that the amount of waste being disposed of at the three operating sites must be curtailed. Waste generators, States and compact regions would have to allocate the available disposal capacity. Suggestions have been made regarding how to practically and equitably allocate the available capacity. The appropriate means of distributing the burden of reducing the waste stream will be a major issue to be resolved in the legislative process.

The issues addressed in this legislative package should be resolved by the Congress in this first session if we are to avoid a political crisis and possibly disruption of low-level waste disposal next year. I look forward to the attention and cooperation of my colleagues, all of whom will be directly affected by this legislation.

The language I propose as part of the ratification package, to be adopted as an amendment to each interstate compact, and intended to be enacted concurrently with the Low-Level Radio-Active Waste Policy Amendment Act, is as follows:

MADE IN AMERICA ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today, the Made in America Act, to restrict the quantity of motor vehicles imported by foreign manufacturers into the United States to no more than 15 percent of the total number of new cars sold by foreign and domestic automobile manufacturers in the prior year.

The legislation is designed to prevent or to remedy the serious injury now occurring from foreign automobile imports into the United States economy and the damage that is being done to the American automobile industry, its suppliers, its workers, and auto-related supplier industries, including steel, glass, rubber, plastics, textiles, and computers.

The bill makes a finding that imported motor vehicles, other than motorcycles, are being sold in the United States in such quantities as to cause or threaten to cause injury to the domestic auto industry and its workers and specifies that its purpose is to prevent or remedy the injury consistent with article XIX of GATT. The Secretary of Commerce would administer the provisions of the bill and would annually determine how many foreign and domestic vehicles were sold in the United States and establish a limit of imports of not more than 15 percent of that total. The Secretary would allocate this percentage among foreign manufacturers on the basis of their respective shares for imported vehicles during the prior year. The bill defines "foreign manufacturers" as those who imported at least 100,000 new motor vehicles in the prior year. So any motor vehicle produced or assembled in the United States would not be counted for purposes of determining whether or not a foreign manufacturer is subject to quota restrictions. Moreover, "motor vehicle" is defined in the legislation as any three-wheeled or four-wheeled vehicle, propelled by gasoline or diesel which is primarily for use on the public streets, roads, or highways (whether or not the vehicle has four-wheel drive or utility or multipurpose capability) and which is rated at 10,000 pounds gross weight or less.

The bill provides that civil penalties of up to $2,000 per vehicle could be imposed on manufacturers who violate the quota arrangement and that civil penalties of up to $10,000 per day could be imposed for "knowing" violations of other provisions of the legislation. It is intended that implementation of the legislation would not affect current trade agreements between the United States and Canada and that import restrictions could be terminated after 1990 if the Secretary finds, after a public hearing, that injury to the domestic auto industry and its workers has been remedied.

Certain reporting requirements also are required by the Made in America Act. Each foreign vehicle manufacturer who produces more than 25,000 new imported vehicles sold in the United States after 1982 must provide information to the Secretary regarding the production, importation, distribution, and retail sale in the United States. Moreover, the Secretary must make annual reports to Congress concerning the actions taken under the act and the impact of those actions on foreign vehicle manufacturers and on employees in, and suppliers of, motor vehicle manufacturing operations within the United States, as well as the impact on competition, consumers, sales, and prices of motor vehicles, and the impact on other domestic industries.

Mr. Speaker, many will wonder why it is necessary for me to introduce the Made in America Act, I think a hard look at the events of this day will give us some very real explanation.

The United States is the only nation in the world which does not take active steps to protect and to preserve its basic industries. The United States is the only major industrial nation in the world which practices free trade here and abroad, and the United States is the only country in the world which permits its basic industries to be destroyed one by one by those who flood this Nation with counterfeit goods, by those who disregard their trade agreements with the United States, by those who disregard our laws with regard to marking, labeling of textiles, cosmetics, steel, and other devices, so as to evade not only our laws relative to health and consumer protection, but also our laws relative to the qualities and the kinds of goods concerned.

Investigations by the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation of the Committee on Energy and Commerce have revealed the most outrageous practices imaginable by our foreign trading partners. I would like to call to the attention of this body, and also others, that certain facts speak louder than words.

The United States, its industries, its workers, and its Government, are straining under a record 1984 trade deficit of $123 billion which, if nothing is done, will grow over time. Since 1981, the U.S. auto trade deficit has more than doubled, from $11 billion to $27 billion. Automobile imports have expanded from $19 billion to $32 billion, while American automobile exports have declined from $8 billion a year to $5 billion a year. One of the reasons for that is that our goods are being discriminated against in every nation in the world. It is not only autos or textiles or pharmaceuticals, but agricultural products and agricultural commodities which are being denied fair treatment in the world marketplace.

The $19 billion auto trade deficit with Japan alone accounts for more than one-half of this Nation's overall $36 billion trade deficit with Japan. The deficit will be much greater if the voluntary restraint agreements are not extended beyond March 31 of this year, when they are due to expire, or if quotas are not put in place.

Japanese tax laws and Japanese currency policies give Japanese automakers a massive, competitive advantage here and around the world. The yen is overvalued by as much as 15 percent, which results in a $900-per-car advantage to Japanese automakers. Forgiveness by the Japanese Government of its commodity tax on exported vehicles saves Japanese automakers an additional $600 to $700 per vehicle. Thus, where our automakers compete here or elsewhere around the world with Japanese automakers, they suffer an economic disadvantage of over $1,500 per car.

It is important to recognize the effects of uneven implementation of so-called free-trade policies and trade with the Japanese auto industry. Free trade with the Japanese does not exist, has not existed since World War II, and probably will never exist in the lifetime of anyone in this Chamber. I would observe to you that when the President went to San Francisco to talk to his dear friend, Prime Minister Nakasone, he indicated that he did not intend to push very hard on trade matters. This was a clear signal to the Japanese that events in our trading relationship will persist in the same fashion that they have, with total disregard by the Japanese of the principles of free and fair trade and continued adherence by this Nation to those same principles.

It is clear that this Nation cannot continue to play by Marquis of Queensbury rules, while the rules of alley fighting are used against us by our trading partners. Japanese trade is subsidized. Its markets are closed to many of our products. Up until just recently, if an American cigarette manufacturer wished to trade in Japan and to sell American cigarettes, he was compelled to advertise in English and could only sell in approximately 1 percent of the outlets. American wheat, American corn, and American beef, leaving here at something like $3.50 a pound or $3.50 a bushel, will find that that same commodity is sold in Japan at $16.50 and can only be brought in after Japanese production has all been sold.

This is free trade? Of course not. And the rolls and rosters of Japanese behavior in this area go without end. If an American wants to market his cosmetics in Japan, he must pay $25,000 for each outlet that he chooses to sell in.

□ 1520

Discrimination against every American manufacturer and every American commodity is rampant in Japan and in most of our trading partners under our so-called reciprocal trade agreements. There is disregard of our laws with regard to dumping and disregard of our laws with regard to labeling. Counterfeiting of American goods by foreign nations is a $20 billion industry and is destroying not only American industries but American jobs, American innovation, investment, and technological progress.

It is high time that we all realize that there is no hope for this country, over the long pull, unless we begin to do some of the things that our trading partners are doing until we can get those same trading partners to treat us with the same respect that we treat their goods.

I am introducing today the "Made in America Act." It is with a great deal of sorrow that I do this. This statute will restrict the quantity of motor vehicles imported by foreign manufacturers into the United States. It will permit more generous quotas on automobiles manufactured by foreigners than any nation in the world. It will also afford a measure of sensible protection until we can get an administration that is willing to negotiate and to talk tough to these foreigners who are destroying American industries, depriving Americans of jobs, and imperiling the future of this Nation.

Our trade deficit last year cost the United States 3 million unemployed—3 million jobs gone, most of them probably gone permanently. This Nation has to recognize that those 3 million jobs cost the Federal Government, in terms of its total budgetary deficit, better than $30 billion for each million unemployed, or for a total of $90 billion that showed up in our deficit. That is almost half the entire amount of the U.S. Federal budget deficit.

If this Congress had achieved fair treatment and a balance in trade which was fair and not bottomed on American workers and American industries competing with others who deny us access to their markets, this country would have had a budget deficit of a little over $100 billion. This country would now be looking forward to moving toward a balanced budget and would be understanding that the future of American industries, the balancing of its budget, and interest rates would all be moving in the direction that we, as patriotic Americans, desire.

I would have my colleagues know that my father was one of the authors of the Reciprocal Trade Act. It is time that this Congress understood what reciprocal trade is. Reciprocal trade says that both of the trading parties reduce discrimination against goods and against trade and currencies and manufacturers of its trading partner, not that one like the United States permits untrammeled and free entry of goods into its market with total disregard, not only of laws and agreements but of basic decency by its trading partners. And that will not happen until and unless something is done by this administration to restore balance in trade in all of our commodities and to move this country from the unfortunate position in which it is today. And that position is that this Nation is now occupying with the Japanese and a number of other countries around the world the same position that India did in the days of good Queen Victoria. We supply the raw materials, the food, and the fiber; they provide us with finished manufactures. We know why the Indians roused themselves in rage and threw the British out. It is time that the United States recognizes that our interests demand no less.

Toward this end, I am introducing, as I have mentioned, the "Made in America Act." In this, I am joined by 30 of my distinguished colleagues, and more will be joining. I would observe that this has the support of three of our major automobile manufacturers, Ford, Chrysler, and AMC. It also has the support of the steelworkers and the autoworkers, and others will be joining in this and similar legislation until we can begin to get fair treatment for American industry, for American workers, for the American economy, and for Americans yet to come.

Mr. Speaker, under my unanimous consent request, I include herewith a list of the names of my colleagues who have joined in the sponsorship of this legislation, together with the language of the bill, as follows:

H.R. 1050

A bill to restrict temporarily the quantity of imported motor vehicles that may be introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail in order to prevent or remedy the existing and threatened serious injury to the domestic motor vehicle industry of the United States and its employees and suppliers

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Made in America Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that imported motor vehicles are being sold in interstate commerce in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause, or threaten to cause, serious injury to the domestic industry that manufactures like or directly competitive motor vehicles and to the domestic suppliers of such industry and the people working in that industry and for such suppliers.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to prevent or remedy the actual and threatened injury referred to in subsection (a) by providing on a temporary basis (in addition to any other remedy required or authorized under any other provisions of law, including any domestic content requirement) restrictions on the number of new imported motor vehicles that may be sold in interstate commerce; and

(2) to help bolster the economy, including employment and the trade balance, in the United States by ensuring that the domestic motor vehicle manufacturing industry continues to produce in facilities located in the United States the greatest share of the new motor vehicles, including components thereof, sold in domestic markets.

SEC. 3. CONGRESSIONAL INTENT AND DISCLAIMER.

(a) INTENT.—It is the intent of Congress (1) to provide in this Act for fair competition in the sale of foreign and domestic motor vehicles in interstate commerce; and (2) that this Act shall be construed as an emergency action by the United States on imports of new motor vehicles within the meaning of article XIX of the executive agreement known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which provides for the suspension, withdrawal, or modification of any obligation or concession under that agreement in whole or in part in order to prevent or remedy a serious injury that is caused or threatened.

(b) DISCLAIMER.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed—

(1) to modify or amend the terms or conditions of any international treaty, convention, or agreement that may be applicable to motor vehicles entered for sale and distribution in interstate commerce and to which the United States (on the date of the enactment of this Act) is a party, including, but not limited to, the terms or conditions of any treaty, convention, or agreement (including the agreement referred to in subsection (a)) which provide for the resolution of conflicts between the parties thereto;

(2) to—

(A) confer jurisdiction upon any court of the United States to consider and resolve such conflicts, or

(B) alter or amend any law (existing on the date of enactment of this Act) which may confer such jurisdiction in such courts; or

(3) to affect in any way or manner any products, goods, or services other than motor vehicles;

SEC. 4. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act—

(1) The term "base year" means the second calendar year preceding a calendar year for which quantitative restrictions are established under section 5(a).

(2) The term "foreign vehicle manufacturer" means a manufacturer of new imported motor vehicles at least 100,000 of which are introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during a calendar year (or at least 100,000 of which were introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during any calendar year before the date of the enactment of this Act). The term includes as one entity all persons who control, are controlled by, or are in common control with such a manufacturer, and also includes any predecessor of or successor to such a manufacturer.

(3) The term "imported motor vehicle" means a motor vehicle that is not manufactured or assembled within the United States.

(4) The term "motor vehicle" means any three-wheeled or four-wheeled vehicle, propelled by gasoline or diesel fuel, which is—

(A) primarily for use on the public streets, roads, and highways (whether or not the vehicle has 4-wheel drive or utility or multipurpose capability); and

(B) rated at 10,000 pounds gross vehicle weight or less.

Such term does not mean any motorcycle or any vehicle operated exclusively on a rail or rails.

(5) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce.

(6) The term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States Virgin Islands, and Guam.

(7) The term "United States", when used in a geographical context, means all states.

SEC. 5. QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN MOTOR VEHICLES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The aggregate number of new imported motor vehicles introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during any calendar year after 1985 may not exceed a number equal to 15 percent of the aggregate number of—

(1) new motor vehicles manufactured or assembled within the United States; and

(2) new imported motor vehicles;

that were introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during the base year. A new imported motor vehicle may not be treated under this Act as having been introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail before customs entry into the United States of that vehicle is made.

(b) ALLOCATIONS.—(1) The Secretary shall allocate the number of new imported motor vehicles equaling the 15 percent or less limitation determined under subsection (a) for each calendar year among foreign vehicle manufacturers on the basis of the respective shares of those manufacturers of the United States market for imported new motor vehicles during the base year.

(2) In making allocations for any calendar year under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall, consistent with the findings and purposes of this Act, undertake to ensure, to the greatest extent possible, equity and avoid creating competitive advantages or disadvantages between foreign vehicle manufacturers and the motor vehicle manufacturing industry located within the United States.

(c) DETERMINATIONS AND PUBLICATION.—(1) The Secretary shall determine the quantitative restrictions under subsection (a) for each calendar year not later than four months before January 1 of that year. The Secretary shall immediately publish notice of the determination in the Federal Register.

(2) The Secretary shall identify foreign vehicle manufacturers and determine the allocations under subsection (b) for each of those manufacturers for each calendar year not later than two months after the date of publication of notice in the Federal Register under paragraph (1) of the quantitative restrictions for that year. The Secretary shall allow not less than 20 days for written comment by interested parties regarding proposed allocations.

SEC. 6. ENFORCEMENT.

(a) VIOLATIONS OF SECTION 5.—If the Secretary finds, after notice and an opportunity for hearing in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code, that the number of new imported motor vehicles manufactured by a foreign vehicle manufacturer that is introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during a calendar year exceeds the allocation established under section 5(b) for that manufacturer for that year, the Secretary shall issue an order of violation against that manufacturer assessing it a civil penalty of $2,000 for each new imported motor vehicle manufactured by that manufacturer that is introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during that calendar year in excess of that allocation.

(b) OTHER VIOLATIONS.—Any person who knowingly violates any provision of this Act (other than subsection (a)), or any rule or regulation issued under this Act, shall be liable, after notice and opportunity for a hearing in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code, to the United States for a civil penalty of not more than $10,000. Each day of a continuing violation under this subsection shall constitute a separate offense. The Secretary shall promptly assess such penalty by order.

(c) FAILURE TO PAY ASSESSMENTS.—(1) If the penalty has not been paid within ninety calendar days after the assessment order has been made under subsection (a) or (b), the Secretary shall institute an action in the appropriate district court of the United States for an order affirming the assessment of the civil penalty.

(2) If any person fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty after the appropriate district court has entered final judgment in favor of the Secretary under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall institute an action to recover the amount of such penalty in the appropriate district court of the United States.

(d) COMPROMISE.—The Secretary may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any penalty that is subject to imposition or that has been imposed under this section.

SEC. 7. INFORMATION AND REPORTS.

(a) VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS RECORDS AND INFORMATION.—Each foreign vehicle manufacturer that produces more than 25,000 new imported motor vehicles that were introduced into interstate commerce for sale at retail during any calendar year after 1982 must establish and maintain such records, and provide such information, regarding the production, importation, distribution, and sale at retail in interstate commerce of motor vehicles produced by it as the Secretary by rule shall require for purposes of carrying out provisions of this Act.

(b) AUTHORITY TO OBTAIN INFORMATION.—(1) The authority granted to the Secretary of Transportation under subsection (b)(1) of section 505 of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Saving Act (as in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act) to obtain information and data, and access thereto, that is deemed advisable by him for purposes of carrying out part V of that Act may be used by the Secretary for purposes of obtaining the information and data, and access thereto, that is necessary or appropriate to carry out this Act.

(2) The authority granted to the district courts of the United States under subsection (b)(2) of such section 505 to enforce compliance with action taken by the Secretary of Transportation under subsection (b)(1) of such section may be used by such courts to enforce actions taken by the Secretary under paragraph (1) for purposes of carrying out this Act.

(3) The Secretary shall disclose any information and data obtained under this section to the public only in accordance with section 552 of title 5, United States Code; and any matter described in subsection (b)(4) of such section 552 shall not be disclosed to the public, except that where such matter may be relevant to any administrative or judicial proceeding to enforce this Act, such matter may be disclosed in such proceeding only in a manner which would not result in competitive damage, or disadvantage, as determined by the Secretary or a court, because of such disclosure.

SEC. 8. TERMINATION OF QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS.

If at any time after December 31, 1990, the Secretary finds, after holding a public hearing (for which notice is published) commencing not earlier than 60 days after such date, that the injury referred to in section 2(a) has been prevented or remedied, section 5 shall cease to have force and effect at the close of the calendar year in which that finding is made, except that nothing in this section shall be construed as affecting or waiving any action under section 6 initiated by the Secretary for a violation that occurred before such close. The Secretary shall immediately notify the Congress in writing of a finding made under this section and publish notice thereof in the Federal Register.

SEC. 9. ANNUAL REPORTS.

The Secretary shall annually report to the Congress concerning the actions taken by the Secretary and to be taken under this Act and the impact of this Act and those actions on foreign vehicle manufacturers and on employees in and suppliers of, motor vehicle manufacturing operations within the United States, as well as the impact on competition, consumers, sales, and prices of motor vehicles, and the impact on other domestic industries and the employees thereof. Such reports shall be balanced and shall identify and consider all relevant factors. The first report shall be on March 1 of the calendar year first occurring after the date of the enactment of this Act.

THE TRADE IMBALANCE AND OTHER PROBLEMS IN THE ECONOMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I mentioned in passing, among several other basic items, the very point that has been under discussion here this afternoon by several of my colleagues, those speaking with respect to the dilemma confronting the farmer and including the most recent speaker who preceded me, the very preeminent chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, our distinguished, highly respected, and very much appreciated and loved colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], who spoke with respect to the need to introduce legislation that, of course, will be strongly denounced by some as a protectionist measure that is antithetic and contradictory to the free trade policy. This follows legislation that, as he said so well and so historically correct, was introduced as a matter of legislative policy by his father, who was a Member of this House in the 1930's.

But the reason I referred to this and the context in which I made reference relates to the thing that I think has to be addressed and should have been addressed long ago. Coming events cast their shadows before them. Wise peoples, wise governments, and wise leaders heed those signs—handwriting on the wall, so to speak. Foolish peoples do not. Great democracies such as ours have periods in which, as a collective body, they are very much akin to individual psychologies in which unexplainable actions and acts of heedless disregard of facts and evidence and prudent conduct seem to rule. It is necessary in order for us to address now that which is about to overcome us, which is the heavy involvement to the point of control of foreign forces external to our territory that we cannot control and over which we have very little influence now.

In 1980, for example, we had the international trade account, which includes the broadest perspective of international trade and interest payments. Everybody talks about trade imbalance, which yesterday I said is the real issue and which neither the President in his message last night nor the congressional leaders nor the past Presidents since 1960 had taken much heed of. And that is not the domestic deficit, which it is possible to temporize for another 2 years, as it has been temporized with for about 3 years, but only to temporize with. But this is the trade imbalance in which I include the account, the interest, the international interest accounts, in order to have a real complete picture of the imbalance, which is the real thing that will not be forgiven us.

Some philosopher said once that "our sins may be forgiven by God, but not by Nature." Well, it seems to me that our sins, our political sins, may be forgiven by the electorate, as they have been here obviously, but they will not be forgiven by the hard laws of human economic facts of life in an interrelationship of human beings on this globe.

The sad fact is that we should have learned, we should have been mindful, because almost the same pattern occurred after World War I. I have spoken out on that before, so it is not my intention to enlarge on that on this occasion. During the last Congress I placed in the RECORD what I considered to be a historical parallel and gave answers, dipping into historical sources that I think, had it not been for the fact that I had been given the great privilege of living this long, and having a good memory and having retained publications and books that were given to me since I was 15 years of age, I could not have brought in that parallel situation.

I have tried futilely to call the attention of past Presidents, beginning in 1965, pointing out to them President Johnson what seemed to me an ominous and foreboding development as reflected in that year's annual Federal Reserve report for, one, the level of Federal procurement exceeded $45 billion for the first time.

Second, there was nothing taking cognizance of the impact of the soft underbelly of our economy. Back home I was witnessing it. For example, school boards were discovering that bond issues they had just floated the year before were inadequate to construct new classroom space because of the exponential increase in the cost of prime material, copper, steel, and also labor; but in the same newspapers reflecting the need to float another bond issue to make it possible to construct, in the want ads were huge ads asking for labor and the address of the labor advertiser was in San Francisco, and that was for trained and skilled workers, carpenters and the like, in order to go to Southeast Asia and help in the construction of what was then going to turn out to be Cam Ranh Base. So with that pressure on the soft underbelly, I felt that past history had revealed that wise Presidents had asked the Congress for some kind of recognition of the incipient beginning of inflationary pressures, plus budgetary pressures, and therefore the need for either, one, a source of revenue that would make up for this expenditure that had reached, as I say, these high proportions, or some kind of controls, minimal credit controls and the like.

Well, nobody was much interested then. Interest rates were at 6 percent or perhaps even a little less. Nobody thought that the day would ever come that interest rates, prime interest rates, would even reach 8 percent, much less 10 percent, much less 15 percent, and astoundingly 21 percent in 1980 and 1981; so that when I wrote the letter to the President, it was merely sort of a suggested message in which I was pointing out that unless we took cognizance of these forces and in anticipation did something. As I have said on repeated occasions, I have never taken the floor here or the Senate of Texas or the city council chambers of the city of San Antonio and taken a position of criticism without offering, if the case called for it, some kind of an alternative or suggested course of action.

I remember vividly since I had not intended or planned to get into political endeavor, every inch of the way has been a learning process.

I remember that my first stint in the city council, it seemed to me that the philosophy among the political office holders was that you wet your fingers, place it up, see which way the wind was going and then go in that direction.

One of the crises at San Antonio, my home city, had been agitated with was the annual perennial negotiation with threatened strike and actual strike of the busdrivers. The transportation company, the bus company, was privately owned at the time. So in the month of October the labor contract was due for renegotiation, so that by the time the second week of September came around, the people were told that a strike was imminent, that labor was holding out, management was holding out, that management said, "Well, unless we get a fare increase, we cannot give even the minimal demands of the labor unions." So what ended after a lot of commotion and maybe a strike of 3 or 4 days was the city council meeting in great precipitation and crisis and passing an ordinance increasing the rate of fares on the buses.

I thought that was kind of silly, that if we knew this was happening as regularly as the swallows coming to Capistrano in California that we should have some anticipatory action; so I suggested in April the following year, my first year, that the mayor name a committee to study and sit down with management and sit down with labor and anticipate and have a chance to analyze from the standpoint of honest public utility regulation procedures a fair return on fair value.

Well, I am very happy to report that the mayor heeded and for the first year San Antonio did not have a strike. It did not have a commotion and it even got along without a minimal increase in fare, but we had what I call anticipatory action. That has been the whole basis of my philosophy as I have gone into this endeavor that I call legislative advocacy. Once I discovered that this indeed was what through attribute, training and education I would be happy doing, I labeled it legislative advocacy and this is what I have been trying to do, to provide affirmative, constructive, and anticipatory legislation and suggestions.

I also learned that in this great system of ours if you are right and if you persist and if you are blessed with endurance and life in politics, that eventually you will be heard, eventually the positive and the affirmative that is rooted in truthful and accurate presentation is going to be adopted.

I think that is the saving sap of our system, of our democratic participatory representative form of government.

I know that some of the greatest things that in my book I consider accomplishments have taken as long as 11 years. For example, a bill I introduced in 1965 also while I was speaking out on the coming crisis that it seemed to me would develop into a phenomenon that we had not experienced before. I was not smart enough to coin the phrase, but later on somebody called it "stagflation." It is the coexistence of the inflationary with depressionary forces on one sector with high unemployment and also high wages and relative wealth on the other, but with high inflationary forces.

This was a phenomenon that did not come in strong and perceptive fashion until after phase 3 of the peacetime imposed so-called Economic Stabilization Act; that is the Price and Wage Controls Act of 1971.

So that there is always a cause and effect. These problems that we now find ourselves in the throes of which our leaders in the executive branch of the Government have refused to accept, much less confront, are cause and effect. These are not God mandated problems. These problems of high interest rates, extortionate interest rates, our country being converted to the dumping ground instead of the producing country that it has been up until 4 years ago, these are not acts of God. They are manmade solutions.

The problem is that now for a numerous body such as the Congress to bring about quick and effective remedies, even as late as time is, is most difficult. In fact, it is insuperable.

This is the reason why throughout our history in time of crisis this body has had to delegate tremendous grants of constitutional authority to that unitary force that can act with quick dispatch in quick reaction to a quick emergency and especially in the structured world that we have been living in especially in the last three decades.

□ 1540

Now, these are things that need attention one at a time so that this is the reason why on Monday I came here on the floor of the House, used this forum to outline broad perspectives.

Yesterday I emphasized two main elements and the one was the unaddressed, until today, serious, critical question of the trade imbalance.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I will include in the RECORD an article in today's Washington Post on page A-23 by Hobart Rowan. It is a byline by Hobart Rowan and the title of it is "Doubts About the Dollar."

The article referred to follows:

DOUBTS ABOUT THE DOLLAR

(By Hobart Rowan)

Any federal budget—and President Reagan's latest is no exception—is based on a number of economic assumptions. Expressing pride over an economic recovery that is "faster than any other upturn since 1951," Reagan forecast a continuation of good times.

"The thriving venture-capital market is financing a new American revolution of entrepreneurship and technological change," the president said in his separate Economic Report to Congress. "The American economy is once again the envy of the world."

The president's satisfaction with the current economic surge is understandable. Yet, at the highest levels of his government, there is a nagging doubt about the future, perhaps best expressed by budget director David Stockman.

Stockman—who may soon leave Washington after a stormy career—warned that in dealing with the budget deficit, "the hour is almost too late already."

That, to be sure, represents part of Stockman's pitch to Congress to do the budget-deficit job the president's way: by attacking middle-income civilian expenditures, doing little to restrain military programs or Social Security entitlements, and—of course—ignoring the need to raise taxes.

But the real weakness with the administration's look into the future is its failure to deal effectively with what may be the single most important variable in its economic assumptions: the extraordinarily high value of the dollar, which, according to the budget document, has risen 70 percent in foreign-exchange markets since the end of 1980.

The document makes some candid observations on the dollar problem, but then walks away from it:

Because the high value of the dollar has made American exports more expensive for foreigners, and imported goods tantalizingly cheap, "the current account, the broadest services, and interest payments between the United States and other countries," which had been about in balance in 1980, last year was in deficit to the tune of $104 billion.

Because the prospect is that this deficit will continue "for the foreseeable future," the United States this year will become a debtor nation. This means that assets owned by foreigners here will exceed those that we own abroad.

This dramatic shift in our international accounts is in part the direct result of the budget deficit's impact on interest rates: The high-priced dollar has attracted capital investment from overseas.

That's good news and bad news. The good news is that foreign money has helped finance the federal budget deficit, averting a credit crunch here. The bad news is that the resultant current-account deficit has soared out of sight. Now foreign investors have a larger role in determining the economic future of the United States.

What happens if foreigners get edgy about their investments here and slow them down? What happens if there is a sudden, sharp drop in the value of the dollar?

The budget document offered this cautious appraisal: "The long-run problem [of the dollar] concerns the consequences for the economy should foreigners attempt to reduce their purchases of dollar assets while we are still running a large current-account deficit. Under such circumstances, the inflation rate might temporarily rise as the dollar's exchange rate falls. In addition, there could be a rise in interest rates and slower overall economic growth."

The implication is clear, but not made explicit by the budget document: a dollar decline of any significance would make mincemeat of the administration's scenario calling for steady economic growth, low inflation rates and further interest-rate declines. The huge deficits projected by the administration would be—incredibly—even bigger.

Former Treasury assistant secretary C. Fred Bergsten points out that even under the administration's current assumptions, there will be a huge buildup in interest payments to foreigners. By 1990, this figure will top $100 billion annually. The current-account deficit, according to Bergsten, will be $150 billion this year, $200 billion by 1988

How long can such an inflow of foreign capital be sustained? If it slows down markedly, then the dollar could fall sharply, boosting interest rates skyward, sowing the seeds of a new recession.

Asked for his opinion, Reagan economic adviser William Niskanen said that the United States should not expect "any significant decline in the dollar" because interest-rate differences between the United States and other countries have been narrowing.

By itself, that's not very reassuring: it assumes a willingness on the part of foreigners to invest here despite growing debt, and continuing acceptance by American manufacturers and farmers of lost markets for their exports, while imports soar to new heights.

Mr. GONZALEZ. For the first time in a popularly disseminated column this phrase is used.

"Because the high value of the dollar has made American exports more expensive for foreigners, and imported goods tantalizingly cheap, the 'current account, the broadest measure of trade, services, and interests payments,' "—this is the first time I have seen that phrase, "interest payments" included "between the United States and other countries," which had been about in balance in 1980, last year was in deficit to the tune of $104 billion.

It is really closer to $133 billion if you take the entire spectrum of your interaction on the international level.

Then it ends up by saying that this has converted our country from a producer country to a consumer.

This I think is the most ominous thing of all, because up to 4 years ago this was not true. But in the meanwhile the vital element which we call interest rates, at the heart of the whole matter, remains unaddressed.

In 1965, going back to the letter I wrote to President Johnson, I pointed out that there was nothing to prevent any kind of incremental or exponential increase in the prime interest rate. There were no laws. The last laws were scrapped in 1865 with the adoption of the National Currency Act of 1865, one that President Abraham Lincoln had a great foreboding on his mind at the time he was killed, and upon his death, or in the middle of the commotion of his death this National Currency Act of 1865, which laid the groundwork for what they called then the National Banking System, came into being. But the essential issue has always been the same simply because interest rates is a mechanism whereby the wealth of the country is distributed.

Now, nowhere do you see this defined that way in the economic books. In fact, the vogue has been for the last decade or decade and one-half to say interest rates are just the market representation of any other economic activity, any other goods. Of course that is a horrible misinterpretation, malinterpretation, and one that is having fatal consequences to us and our way of living because at the heart of the matter, as I stated in my letter to President Johnson in 1965, ultimately is what we pride ourselves as the American standard of living. This is what is at stake. This is the issue.

Just like after World War I it would have been impossible to have said that was the issue in 1928. Even as late as May of 1929, that was more or less about 5 months before the great Black Friday and the stock market crash in October that a Presidential Commission was talking very much, almost in the same words as the President used last night in his State of the Union.

Everything is glowing. We see nothing in the foreseeable future to dim this rosy prosperity that we are all sharing today.

That was in May of 1929. And it was a preeminent commission that the President had appointed that was reporting that way. So we know that there is such a thing as miscalculation, even by some well-intentioned minds.

But when the motor force or energy behind the decision really turns out to be greed, and a battle of appetite, so to speak, then any nation that yields that vital, vital decisionmaking power to any such entity is a lost nation.

There is good reason why even 7,000 years before Christ, the Code of Hammurabi shows strict prohibition of usury or interest rate control, if you please. As our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ was speaking there was strong laws and punishment by death for usury or high interest rates or extortionate interest rates.

Why? Today my predecessor colleague speaking about the Japanese imports, and with justification, except I feel that today the barn door, so to speak, is open, and the horse is gone, if we want to go back to the day of horses. I do not know that we can say that about automobiles and garages today because somebody has to operate that machinery today. But it is no different.

The Japanese at home, for instance, have a very different structured society. I do not know that we anymore would like the structured, planned, highly controlled society of an out and out Socialist economy.

I always say that regardless of what you call them, the basic element is one of authoritarianism or dictatorship. If you have a Fascist corporate regime such as Hitler's, or Mussolini's, it is just one side of the same coin. If you have the Socialist or the dictatorship of the proletariat, well, the words themselves say that it is a dictatorship.

It is anything but the self-government, the self-determination of the people which is what I think the American experiment is all about.

Now, when this essential power, which some people call the allocation of credit, the Nation's resources is turned over to the forces that thrive on the profitmaking and the control, insatiable forces—Thomas Jefferson had speech after speech, even Alexander Hamilton, who to a certain extent today in our rough labeling would be considered a conservative, inveighed and was very careful about what kind of power was going to be given.

For instance, i9n the first 10 years of our national existence, nobody even wanted to bother with such an office as the presidency or chief magistrate, as they called it then, so you did not have any. You had the First and the Second Continental Congresses. But every government has to have a banker, so that that became the issue, who was the priceless prerogative, control of the credit allocation, going to be given to.

So they chartered what they called the Bank of North America in Philadelphia, but with strict control. Naturally the bankers at first said no, we are not if you are going to limit us. And of course Jefferson and them were not about to allow them to charge 6 percent or more, so they were limited.

But that was another day, another time. But all through our development this has been the essential issue. For the first time in our national existence as a government under this form, as provided in the Constitution, the fears of Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, and lastly Woodrow Wilson, and even Franklin Roosevelt, because at the beginning of the war the bankers rebelled, you know, and everybody says draft the young, but nobody wants to draft the wealth. And they did the same thing, the bankers did, out of Philadelphia, and stood up and said we are just not going to do it, we just will not be your banker; we will just not do it.

Franklin Roosevelt had a dilemma but he turned to that, and at that time we had leaders that were not amenable to sacrificing that precious national freedom so they stood up and Henry Morgenthau then said, "Look, you don't do it, fine; we will work the mechanism provided for in the Federal Reserve Board Act of 1913" which incidentally was amended out of existence in 1952 and is one of the reasons why, if you look at your dollar bill you will see "Federal Reserve" not "Treasury Note."

Even that is very revelatory. But the essence is that what has resulted is that for the first time in the history of our Nation's Government those forces are in total control of the policymaking judgmental decisions and all that enters into those decisions that affect the allocations of credit whether or not you are going to have a high dollar, a dear dollar and therefore what, loss of jobs? Yes, because for every one of those $10, $15 billion of the $133 billion you can kiss away about a million American jobs permanently, permanently, gone forever.

Now, reverse direction? If we approve the legislation suggested here? It won't be that simple because these other forces remain unaddressed. The same thing happened after World War I; no different. The drama was the same, the characters, the names of the countries might have been different, in some cases; ironically not in the case of Japan. In the case of Japan we had the mania on Wall Street right after the twenties, before 1929, between 1922 and 1929 this horrible speculation in which the bankers were sucking up our American depositors' hard-earned money, sending it to the bond dealers in Wall Street who in turn, because of that literally high interest payment, were sending them over and investing, in what? German Government bonds, while the German Government together with the Allies, France, and England, were trying to find a way in which they could treat Uncle Sam like they were popularly calling him then, "Uncle Sap." And they did. They succeeded. They succeeded because the United States was the only creditor nation in either World War I or World War II. If it had not been for our credit, neither World War I or World War II would have lasted more than 4 or 5 days. Yet nowhere do you see those things addressed. When the war did break up, and I remember, I have total recall, I can remember the sounds, the smells, the noise, the utterances. I remember Franklin Roosevelt saying to the people in his addresses "We will build and produce 50,000 warplanes." Well, 50,000 warplanes at that time sounded very much like star wars sounds today.

Mr. Roosevelt talked very strongly, but not one plane over maybe a dozen could have been possible if, first, the cartel which by then was headquartered in Switzerland, had not been willing even through the German interests still pretty much in control of those cartels, to release the magnesium and the prime products that were essential for the construction of those warplanes.

The same thing has been happening. For instance, in 1979 after futilely trying to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of which I have been a member since I came, and also for 10 years I was chairman of the Subcommittee on International Finance; I had appealed to the chairman to call in the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of the Treasury and find out precisely what is the amount of money that now is being invested by foreign ownership or foreign investors in our banks and our banking system; in some of our prime land; in some of our prime manufacturing processes. To what extent? I did not succeed.

But then came the crisis of 1973-74, the oil embargo, so-called. I could not believe my eyes that the real issue was not being addressed. That was that for the first time, sucked from our economy were huge sums; the so-called Eurodollar, for instance, increased exponentially. Our international corporations, and remember no more than the cartels in the thirties had any allegiance to any country to these multinational corporations; they transcend any national sovereignty. So that we might have structured after World War II the mechanisms that we thought were really governmental and international but which really were structured, for instance at Bretton Woods, where we created the International Monetary Fund. This was supposed to stabilize forever this thing of your international markets, your imbalances, your sudden flurries in prices, the devaluations so destructive to countries. But all the time the real power struggle was between what would be created and granted by way of authority by the nations to the IMF and what the International Bank for Settlement in Basel, Switzerland, would be willing to give. And of course they give nothing.

So the real decisions are there. They are not accounting to any particular nation. The whole question is loyalty to that which will bring the most and which is insatiable.

The more they have, the more they will want. So that if Americans are flagellated with extortionate rates of interest which still persist, the real rates of interest today, that is what you and I, average citizens, must pay, is still exorbitant, it is still extortionate. In our system of economy it is fatal because before World War II we prided ourselves on mass production, mass consumption. I remember the real poverty of that era, prewar, and I remember the tremendous amount, the diversity, the quantity, the abundance of goods available after. Then we structured the third leg in this fundamental three-legged stool, mass production, mass consumption, and mass credit availability, the installment plan to enable the masses of citizens to acquire those goods.

That is what has been eroded with high interest rates because that third leg was predicated upon controlled interest rates, nominal interest rates, not runaway, extortionate interest rates such as has been flagellating our economy and our citizens and our businessmen. Yet to reverse the trend is not that simple as it would have been easier in 1965 to have addressed the problem. So the question now is, What do you do? Well, specifically since 1979 I have been addressing that question and have been submitting suggestions by way of legislative proposals to my colleagues and have reintroduced thus far in the 99th Congress just about one-third and hope to develop as we go along into the session the balance of that program.

Now for the first time today, I heard colleagues speaking in a way that I didn't hear since 1979. So perhaps there will be some hope to at least confront the issue.

The Congress cannot do it alone, but it does have the prime responsibility. I have submitted legislation for instance, as long ago as 1965 with respect to the Federal Reserve Board. The misconceptions are fatal. There is not a Member of this House, I think, that will say to the constituents that the Federal Reserve Board is not a Federal agency or a Federal Government entity.

Yet the truth is that it is not. That sounds astounding to some; I found that to be true in the case of some of the colleagues, and some of my constituents. But that is the truth.

The truth is that since 1923, the creation of the Open Market Committee which was directly contradictory to all of the basis of the hearings and the actions that took place that finally led to the adoption of the Federal Reserve Board Act of 1913.

We have had a constant and further removal of that all-important body away from control by the people. We are living in a day and time in which we are told, very much like all who have assumed great powers that necessity requires what they call "independence." We do not trust the people, we do not trust the representatives of the people; we cannot handle that. Yet we created that body.

The Federal Reserve Board was not of divine origin; it was created by the Congress, and not as a so-called independent body; but it is today so independent that it is not accountable to anybody, neither the President nor Congress.

I hear no outcry and have not heard any. The proposals I have sought have been very basic. The last powerful gentleman to take an interest was the late Wright Patman in the last couple of years that he was chairman of the Banking Committee, but we could never get anyplace in bringing about even a whole scale set of hearings on the matter.

In 1965 we got the last amount of money for way overdue studies of interlocking directorates; the taking over of one bank by another bank through the hypothecation of bank stocks. These were clearly thrusts that were antithetical to the processes of chartering a bank, of accountability.

If you have that lack of accountability then I do not think that we should be surprised or shocked at the things that are happening today are happening, because what it means is that the American people have been sold down the river. Just as much as they were in that period between the First and Second World Wars.

It is incredible to think that such would happen. It was incredible to me in 1979 that I would have to take the floor after 3 years of futily trying to get the then-chairman, to call the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and just ask questions.

The thing that led to me taking the floor was that I soon assembled the statistics to clearly show—and I must remind my colleagues that at that time I was chairman of the International Finance Subcommittee. Since I pride myself in keeping abreast of foreign publications, including financial publications in French and Spanish and the British publications, it has been amazing what a source of information that has been; as a sole source almost.

If we have our leaders unaware or acting in a vacuum, or unwittingly acting on behalf of those forces that submerges the national interest for the international profitmaking thrust, then I think that we really should not be surprised.

I think at this point that we ought to accept the fact that we do have a crisis. That at this point it may be late to manage, which publicly the awareness is not unmanageable but which in reality may be.

In 1979 when I addressed the House and said that in less than 1 year and 3 months the amount of overhang on private banks' lending, the Third World or developing countries that did not have the ability to pay back, had grown from $3 billion to over $45 billion—nobody seems to care, and yet it became a near-crisis not too long ago.

You had the crisis in Mexico and suddenly the taxpayers had to ante up $4.5 billion in crisis, just in Mexico alone, and that was in order to shore up Mexico's ability to roll over the interest payments of those same unwise loans that the principal banks of the United States had made.

I knew by dead reckoning in 1979 that if it had reached that range, that the principal banks making those loans had loaned out in excess of their capital structure.

Now if that were to happen back home to any of the local banks, why, the regulatory bodies would have declared them insolvent. So this is the threat at this point.

Wise men do not wait; wise people do not have to put their finger in the fire to learn that it is going to get burned; yet that is what it seems we keep doing, keep tantalizingly challenging the forces that are there inexorably to burn our fingers.

In this case, though, it is absolutely imperative that the Congress address by one, two, three sequence the specific actions that Congress can take; that is within its constitutional grant of authority. Given the lack of Executive leadership in this area—which is vital, but it has been absent.

I am happy to say that I have presented in specific suggested legislative presentations what I consider to be at least what ought to be the focus of debate. There is no such thing as a perfect bill ever being written by anybody; this is why we have discussion and debate.

I say that our failure to have even considered the matter is one that we cannot temporize with much longer. The international trade deficit which is as I said a range including all of the trade activities plus interest. If the foreign infusion of temporary, short-term money has reached the portion of danger where the crisis at the Continental-Illinois last year was precipitated not by the crisis of the Penn Square Bank which had sucked out a billion dollars of the Continental Bank, but the sudden loss of confidence or whatever it was that those foreign investors had, and suddenly yanked out that money that caused, for the first time, our Government to nationalize a bank.

Because that is what we have done. If that happened in Mexico, they would say they had nationalized the bank. What it cost the taxpayers was in excess of $4.5 billion.

There is a limit to how many of those banks we can nationalize. There is a limit to how much the resources can stretch, even though our money managers seem to think otherwise, or seem to act as if they think otherwise.

There is no question in my mind that the facts are there; they are immutable, they are irrebuttable, and we must face them. They are situations created by us, human beings; they are susceptible of solution by us human beings.

The farmers speaking about their situation—have the American people been advised that the big deal that President Reagan entered into with China has been reneged upon by China? And that is the purchase of 6 million metric tons of wheat every year. Why is that not admitted to?

In the meanwhile, what kind of a secret pledge did we make on a military basis with the Government of China? We do not know. There has been no report to the Congress; there has been no report to the people. It is the same thing with the money matters. What deals have been made?

□ 1610

Why does the Federal Reserve Board—of course, I know why—because the Federal Reserve Board is not acting in obedience to the dictates of the people as expressed through the Congress, their elected representatives, or the President, their elected head, but to the dictates or seven of the largest private banks in our country. And they certainly cannot be accused of thinking of the national interests first and their ledger sheets second.

H.R. 1017, THE AIRLINE FRINGE BENEFIT EQUITY ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 1017, to provide that transportation provided by an airline to parents of its employees shall be tax free.

As you will recall, the Treasury Department, in 1975, released a draft of proposed regulations to tax certain fringe benefits. Due to the controversial nature of this issue, this document was retracted the following year.

In 1978, legislation was signed into law prohibiting Treasury from issuing regulations relating to the tax treatment of fringe benefits through December 31, 1979. (Public Law 95-427.) On two subsequent occasions, legislation was again signed into law which extended this moratorium until May 31, 1981 (Public Law 96-167) and December 31, 1983 (Public Law 97-34), respectively.

In January 1983, I introduced H.R. 943 to amend the Internal Revenue Code to exclude from gross income reduced airline fare benefits received by airline employees and their families (including parents). This measure would have permanently prohibited Treasury from issuing regulations to tax airline fringe benefits; that is, free and reduced rate transportation. It would not have affected any other fringe benefit.

In July 1983, the chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures, then Honorable Pete Stark, introduced H.R. 3525, the Permanent Tax Treatment of Fringe Benefits Act. As introduced, there were two major differences between this bill and mine (as they related to the tax treatment of fringe benefits received by airline employees and their families).

The first difference was that H.R. 3525 would have prohibited the "interlining" of flight passes vis-a-vis tax exemptions. Thus, if an employee of airline "A" used a flight pass on airline "B", it would have been treated as gross income on which taxes would be due at the end of the year. I must note, however, that "on-line" passes, where an employee of airline "A" uses a flight pass on airline "A", would not have been affected by H.R. 3525. My bill, H.R. 943, would have continued to allow airline employees and their families to use both inter-line and on-line flight passes, without the threat of taxation. The other difference between my bill and H.R. 3525, was that H.R. 943 allowed parents of airline employees to continue receiving these reduced fare travel privileges—again, without the threat of taxation.

In July 1984, the Deficit Reduction Act was signed into law (Public Law 98-369). Title V of this comprehensive measure, Employee Benefit Provisions, was H.R. 3525, with some modifications.

I was pleased to see that, as compared to the "original" H.R. 3525, title V of Public Law 98-369 reinstated the interlining of flight passes for airline employees and their immediate families. Unfortunately, however, parents of airline employees were not readmitted to the program. Thus, effective January 1 of this year, if a parent of an airline employee is given a flight pass to use, their son or daughter will be taxed at a rate equal to 50 percent of the full coach fare for that particular flight on which the pass is used.

For example, if my son was an employee of Pan Am and he supplied my wife and me with a Pan Am flight pass, and the two of us took a round-trip flight today between Washington and Los Angeles, he would have to pay taxes on $1,876 in additional income at the end of the year. This is because the highest coach fare on both legs of our journey would be $938 x 4 [2 flights x 2 people] = $3,752 ÷ 50% = $1,876. I might add that two revenue passengers sitting next to us on the same flights could have paid as little as $476 for their seats.

Although some might object to these airline travel privileges, it must be highlighted that they can only be used for seats which could not be sold to the traveling public prior to departure. Should a plane be full, airline employees and their families remain grounded.

My bill, H.R. 1017, seeks only to again give parents of airline employees the opportunity to take advantage of these travel benefits on an on-line basis only, without the threat of taxation. They could not be issued interline flight passes.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor H.R. 1017. The language of the bill follows:

H.R. 1017

A bill to provide that transportation provided by an airline to parents of its employees shall be tax-free

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TAX-FREE TREATMENT RESTORED FOR TRANSPORTATION PROVIDED BY AN AIRLINE TO PARENTS OF ITS EMPLOYEES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (f) of section 132 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to exclusion of certain fringe benefits) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) PARENTS OF AIRLINE EMPLOYEES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of an employee providing service to an employer in connection with the employer's business of providing air passenger transportation service, any use by a parent of the employee shall be treated as use by the employee.

"(B) SUBPARAGRAPH (a) DOES NOT APPLY TO RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), subsection (g)(2) (relating to reciprocal agreements) shall not apply.

"(C) PARENT DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'parent' means the father, mother, stepfather, and stepmother of the employee, and any individual who is the parent of the employee by virtue of the legal adoption of the employee by such individual."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect as if included in the amendment made by section 531(a) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984.●

REPORT ON CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985 BY COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

(Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, I am submitting to the RECORD a letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of spending and revenues for fiscal year 1985:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 30, 1976, the Committee on the Budget outlined the procedure which it had adopted in connection with its responsibilities under Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide estimates of the current level of revenues and spending.

Pursuant to Committee Rule 10, I am herewith transmitting the status report under H. Con. Res. 280, the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1985. This report reflects the adopted budget resolution of October 1, 1984, and the current CBO estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues.

As with last year, the procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling is affected this year by Section 4(b) of H. Con. Res. 280. Enforcement against possible breaches of the spending ceiling under Section 311(a) of the Budget Act will not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed its "appropriate allocation" made pursuant to Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered. This exception is only provided because an automatic budget resolution is in effect and will cease to apply if Congress revises the budget resolution for fiscal year 1985.

The intent of the Section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by Section 4(b) of the resolution is to protect a committee that has stayed within its spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on H. Con. Res. 280 were printed in the Congressional Record, September 25, 1984, H. 10190 (H. Rept. 98-1079, page 32).

The attached tables compare actual legislation to each committee's 302(a) allocation of discretionary budget authority and of new entitlement authority.

With best wishes,
Sincerely,

WILLIAM H. GRAY III,
Chairman.

The full committee and each subcommittee shall make public announcement of the date, place and subject matter of the full committee or subcommittee hearing at least one week before the commencement of the hearing. However, if the full committee or subcommittee determines that there is good cause to begin the hearing sooner, it shall make the announcement at the earliest possible date. Any announcement made under this rule shall be promptly published in the Daily Digest and promptely entered into the committee scheduling service of the House Information Systems.

RULE 9. MEETINGS AND HEARINGS OPEN TO THE PUBLIC

(a) Each committee or subcommittee meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority being present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public: Provided, however, That no person other than members of the committee and/or subcommittee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to open committee hearings which are provided for by paragraph (b) of this rule, or any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

(b) Each hearing conducted by the full committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public except when the full committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives. Notwithstanding the requirements of the preceding sentence, a majority of those present, there being in attendance no less than two members of the committee or subcommittee, may vote to close the hearing for the sole purpose of discussing whether testimony or evidence to be received would endanger the national security, or would tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person. If the decision is to close for national security reasons, the vote must be by rollcall vote and in open session, there being a majority of the committee or subcommittee present. Otherwise, if the decision is to close because the testimony may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person, the vote may be by a majority of those present, there being in attendance no less than two members of the committee or subcommittee. However, if the committee or subcommittee elects to receive such testimony in open session, it may do so only if a majority of the members of the committee or subcommittee, a majority being present, determine that such evidence or testimony will not tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person. No Member may be excluded from nonparticipatory attendance at any hearing of the full committee or subcommittee, unless the House of Representatives shall by majority vote authorize the full committee or subcommittee, for purposes of a particular series of hearings on a particular article of legislation or on a particular subject of investigation, to close its hearings to Members by the same procedures designated in this rule for closing hearings to the public: Provided, however, That the full committee or the subcommittee may by the same procedure vote to close up to five additional consecutive days of hearings.

(c) Notwithstanding the foregoing, and with the approval of the committee chairman, each member of the committee may designate by letter to the Chairman a member of his or her personal staff with Top Secret security clearance to attend hearings of the committee, or that member's subcommittee(s), which have been closed under the provisions of Rule 9(b) above for national security purposes for the taking of testimony: Provided, That such staff member's attendance at such hearings is subject to the approval of the committee or subcommittee as dictated by national security requirements at the time: Provided further, That this paragraph addresses hearings only and not briefings or meetings held under the provisions of paragraph (a) of this rule; and Provided further, That the attainment of any security clearances involved are the responsibility of individual members.

RULE 10. BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE HEARINGS AND MEETINGS

(a) In accordance with the provision of rule XI, clause 3, Rules of the House of Representatives, it is the purpose of this rule to provide a means, in conformity with acceptable standards of dignity, propriety, and decorum, by which committee or subcommittee hearings or meetings, which are open to the public may be covered by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photography, or by any of such methods of coverage. In that regard, the provisions of rule XI, clause 3(a)-(d) are specifically incorporated herein by reference.

(b) The chairman of the full committee or the chairmen of the subcommittees are authorized to determine on behalf of the full committee or its subcommittees respectively whether hearings or meetings which are open may be broadcast, unless the committee or its subcommittees respectively by majority vote determine otherwise: Provided, however, Each committee or subcommittee chairman shall determine, in his discretion, the number of television and still cameras permitted in a hearing or meeting room.

(c) In accordance with rule XI, clause 3(f), the following provisions shall apply to the broadcasting of committee or subcommittee hearings or meetings which are open to the public:

At the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio, television, or still photography coverage, all lenses shall be covered and all microphones used for coverage turned off. This subparagraph is supplementary to clause 2(k)(5) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, relating to the protection of the rights of witnesses.

(5) Television cameras shall operate from fixed positions but shall not be placed in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing by the other media.

(6) Equipment necessary for coverage by the television and radio media shall not be installed in, or removed from, the hearing or meeting room while the committee or subcommittee is in session.

(7) Floodlights, spotlights, strobelights, and flashguns shall not be used in providing any method of coverage of the hearing or meeting, except that the television media may install additional lighting in the hearing room, without cost to the Government, in order to raise the ambient lighting level in the hearing or meeting room to the lowest level necessary to provide adequate television coverage of the hearing or meeting at the then current state of the art of television coverage.

(8) In the allocation of the number of still photographers permitted by a committee or subcommittee chairman in a hearing or meeting room, preference shall be given to photographers from Associated Press Photos and United Press International News-pictures. If request are made by more of the media than will be permitted by a committee or subcommittee chairman for coverage of the hearing or meeting by still photography, that coverage shall be made on the basis of a fair and equitable pool arrangement devised by the Standing Committee on Press Photographers.

(9) Photographers shall not position themselves, at any time during the course of the hearing or meeting, between the witness table and the members of the committee or its subcommittees.

(10) Photographers shall not place themselves in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing by the other media.

(11) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media shall be then currently accredited to the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(12) Personnel providing coverage by still photography shall be then currently accredited to the Press Photographers' Gallery.

(13) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media and by still photography shall conduct themselves and their coverage activities in an orderly and unobstructive manner.

(14) With the exception of devices properly used by official reporters and by accredited media and broadcast personnel as covered in these rules, no recording or camera type devices may be operated or otherwise used during committee or subcommittee hearings.

A quorum for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence by either the full committee or any subcommittee shall be not less than two. A quorum for taking any other action shall be not less than one-third of the members of the full committee or subcommittee, unless otherwise indicated in the committee rules.

RULE 12. THE FIVE-MINUTE RULE

(a) The time any one member may address the committee or subcommittee on any bill, motion or other matter under consideration shall not exceed five minutes and then only when the member has been recognized by the chairman, except that this time limit may be exceeded by unanimous consent. Any member, upon request, shall be recognized for not to exceed five minutes to address the committee or subcommittee on behalf of an amendment which the member has offered to any pending bill or resolution.

(b) When a meeting is originally convened members present at a meeting of the committee or subcommittee will be recognized by the chairman in order of seniority. Those members arriving subsequently will be recognized in order of their arrival. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the chairman and the ranking minority member will take precedence upon their arrival. In recognizing members to question witnesses in this fashion, the chairman shall take into consideration the ratio of the majority to minority members present and shall establish the order of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority.

RULE 13. SUBPOENA AUTHORITY

The full committee, and all subcommittees, may require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. Any such subpoena may be authorized and issued by the committee, or subcommittee, in the conduct of any investigation or a series of investigations or activities, only when authorized by a majority of the members voting, a majority being present. The power to authorize and issue subpoenas under this rule may be delegated to the chairman of the committee pursuant to such rules and under such limitations as the committee may prescribe. Authorized subpoenas shall be signed by the chairman of the committee or any member designated by the committee.

RULE 14. WITNESS STATEMENTS

(a) Any prepared statement to be presented by a witness to the committee or a subcommittee shall be submitted to the committee at least 48 hours in advance of presentation and shall be distributed to all members of the committee or subcommittee at least 24 hours in advance of delivery. If a prepared statement contains security information bearing a classification of secret or higher, the statement shall be made available in the committee rooms to all members of the committee at least 24 hours in advance of delivery; however, no such statement shall be removed from the committee offices. The requirement of this rule may be waived upon a majority of the full committee or any subcommittee, a quorum being present.

(b) The full committee and each subcommittee shall, insofar as is practicable, require each witness who is to appear before it to file with the committee (in advance of his or her appearance) a written statement of the proposed testimony and to limit the oral presentation at such appearance to a brief summary of his or her argument.

RULE 15. ADMINISTERING OATHS TO WITNESSES

(c) Questions put to witnesses before the committee or subcommittee shall be pertinent to the bill or other subject matter that may be before the committee or subcommittee for consideration.

meeting of the committee, shall designate the person who is to execute the proxy authorization, and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto. A member may authorize a general proxy only for motions to recess, adjourn or other procedural matters. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the member assigning his or her vote and shall contain the date and time of day that the proxy is signed. Proxies may not be counted for a quorum. A proxy may be used in full committee or subcommittees. All proxies must be filed with the staff director and be available for inspection at any time.

RULE 19. PRIVATE BILLS

No private bill will be reported by the committee if there are two are more dissenting votes. Private bills so rejected by the committee will not be reconsidered during the same Congress unless new evidence sufficient to justify a new hearing has been presented to the Congress.

Pursuant to clause 2(a) of rule XI and the unanimous-consent request of January 30, 1985, which extends the date of the printing requirement to February 28, 1985. I submit for printing the rules of the Committee on Rules for the present Congress, adopted at the committee's organizational meeting on Feburary 5, 1985:

Regular meetings

(a)(1) The Committee shall regularly meet at 10:30 a.m. on Tuesday of each week when the House is in session.

(2) A Tuesday meeting of the Committee may be dispensed with if, in the judgment of the Chairman of the Committee (hereafter in these rules referred to as the "Chair"), there is no need for the meeting.

(3) Additional regular meetings and hearings of the Committee may be called by the Chair or by the filing of a written request, signed by a majority of the members of the Committee, with the Staff Director of the Committeee.

(2) for each other bill, resolution, report, or other matter on the agenda, a copy of (A) the bill, resolution, report, or materials relating to the other matter in question, and (B) any report on the bill, resolution, report, or other matter made by any subcommittee of the Committee.

Emergency meetings and hearings

(c)(1) The Chair may call an emergency meeting or hearing of the Committee at any time on any measure or matter which the Chair determines to be of an emergency nature; provided, however, that the Chair has made an effort to consult the Ranking Minority Member.

(2) As soon as possible after calling an emergency meeting or hearing of the Committee, the Chair shall notify each member of the Committee of the time and location of the meeting or hearing and shall particularly make an effort to consult the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee or, in such Member's absence, the next ranking minority party members of the Committee.

(3) To the extent feasible, the notice provided under paragraph (2) shall include the agenda for the emergency meeting or hearing and copies of available materials which would otherwise have been provided under subsection (b) if the emergency meeting or hearing was a regular meeting or hearing.

In general

(a)(1) Meetings and hearings of the Committee shall be called to order and presided over by the Chair or, in the Chair's absence, by the Ranking Majority Member of the Committee present as Acting Chair.

(2) Meetings and hearings of the Committee shall be open to the public unless closed in accordance with clause 2(g) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(3) The five-minute rule shall be observed in the interrogation of each witness before the Committee until each member of the Committee has had an opportunity to question the witness.

(4) When a recommendation is made as to the kind of rule which should be granted for consideration of a bill or resolution, a copy of the language recommended shall be furnished to each member of the Committee at the beginning of the Committee meeting at which the rule is to be considered or as soon thereafter as the proposed language becomes available.

(b)(1) No measure or recommendation shall be reported, deferred, or tabled by the Committee unless a majority of the members of the Committee is actually present.

(2) A rollcall vote of the Committee shall be provided on any question before the Committee upon the request of any member of the Committee.

(3) A record of the vote of each member of the Committee on each rollcall vote on any matter before the Committee shall be available for public inspection at the offices of the Committee.

(4) Notwithstanding subsection (f)(3), the members of the Committee, or one of its subcommittees, present at a meeting or hearing of the Committee or the subcommittee, respectively, may by majority vote, limit the duration of debate, testimony, or Committee or subcommittee consideration with respect to any measure or matter before the Committee or subcommittee, respectively, or provide for such debate, testimony, or consideration to end at a time certain.

Media coverage of committee and subcommittee proceedings

(c)(1) The Committee and each of its subcommittees may permit, by majority vote for each day of an open meeting or hearing of the Committee or of that subcommittee, respectively, the coverage of that meeting or hearing, in whole or in part, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, or still photography.

(2) Any media coverage under this subsection shall be subject to all the requirements and limitations set forth in clause 3 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, and the provisions of subparagraphs (1) through (13) of paragraph (f) of such clause are hereby incorporated as part of the rules of the Committee applicable to such coverage.

(d)(1) For the purpose of hearing testimony on requests for rules, five members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum.

(2) For the purpose of hearing and taking testimony on measures or matters of original jurisdiction before the Committee, three members of the Committee shall constitute a quorum.

Subpoenas and oaths

(e)(1) Pursuant to clause 2(m) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, a subpoena may be authorized and issued by the Committee, on its own initiative or on behalf of a subcommittee thereof, in the conduct of any investigation or series of investigations or activities, only when authorized by a majority of the members voting, a majority being present.

(2) The Chair may authorize and issue subpoenas under such clause during any period in which the House has adjourned for a period of longer than three days.

(3) Authorized subpoenas shall be signed by the Chair or by any member designated by the Committee, and may be served by any person designated by the Chair or such member.

(4) The Chair, or any member of the Committee, may administer oaths to witnesses before the Committee.

Hearings on rules

(f) The following procedures shall apply, as determined by the Chair, acting on behalf of the Committee, in cooperation with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee, to Committee meetings and hearings on rules:

(1) A measure or matter before the Committee which is determined to be non-controversial as to both type of rule and substantive content may be scheduled for consideration by the Committee without any hearing.

(2) A measure or matter before the Committee which is determined non-controversial as to substantive content but controversial as to type of rule may be the subject of a Committee hearing at which the principal proponents and opponents of the rule will be provided an opportunity to testify only as to the type of rule to be granted.

(3) A measure or matter before the Committee which is determined to be controversial as to substantive content by at least six members of the Committee will be the subject of a Committee hearing at which all interested Members of Congress who are proponents or opponents of the measure or matter will be provided a reasonable opportunity to testify.

General oversight responsibility

(g)(1) The Committee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within its jurisdiction.

(2) Upon direction of the Chair, the Committee shall meet to discuss and formulate oversight plans for each new Congress, as described in clause 2(c) of rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

RULE 4—SUBCOMMITTEES

Application of House and committee rules

(a)(1) As provided by clause 1(a)(2) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, subcommittees of the committee are a part of the Committee and are subject to its authority and direction.

(2) Subcommittees of the Committee shall be subject (insofar as applicable) to the Rules of the House of Representatives and, except as provided in this rule, to the rules of the Committee.

Establishment and responsibilities of subcommittees

(b)(1) There shall be two subcommittees of the Committee as follows:

(A) Subcommittee on the Legislative Process, which shall have general responsibility for measures or matters related to relations between the Congress and the Executive branch.

(B) Subcommittee on Rules of the House, which shall have general responsibility for measures or matters related to relations between the two Houses of Congress, relations between the Congress and the Judiciary, and internal operations of the House.

In addition, each such subcommittee shall have specific responsibility for such other measures or matters as the Chair refers to it.

(2) Each subcommittee of the Committee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within its general responsibility.

Reference of measures and matters to subcommittees

(c)(1) In view of the unique procedural responsibilities of the Committee—

(A) no special order providing for the consideration of any bill or resolution shall be referred to a subcommittee of the Committee, and

(B) all other measures or matters shall be subject to consideration by the full Committe except for those measures or matters referred by the Chair to one or both subcommittees of the Committee.

(2) The Chair may refer a measure or matter, which is within the general responsibility of one of the subcommittees of the Committee, jointly or exclusively to the other subcommittee of the Committee where the Chair deems it appropriate.

(3) In referring any measure or matter to a subcommittee, the Chair may specify a date by which the subcommittee shall report thereon to the Committee.

(4) The Chair or a majority of the members of the Committee may re-call for full Committee consideration any measure or matter referred to a subcommittee of the Committee.

Subcommittee membership

(d) The size and ratio of each subcommittee shall be determined by the Committee at its organizational meeting at the beginning of each Congress. Members of the Committee shall be appointed to subcommittee by the Chair in accordance with the rules applicable to each party.

Subcommittee leadership

(e)(1) The majority party members of the Committee shall have the right, in order of full Committee seniority, to bid to be the chairman of one of the subcommittees of the Committee. Any such bid shall be subject to approval by secret ballot of a majority of the members of the majority party caucus of the Committee. If such members reject a member's bid to chair a subcommittee, the next most senior majority member of the Committee may bid for the chair as in the first instance.

(2) The Ranking Minority Member of the Committee shall designate one of the minority party members appointed to each subcommittee of the Committee to serve as ranking minority member for that subcommittee.

Subcommittee meeting and hearings

(f)(1) Each subcommittee of the Committee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive testimony, mark up legislation, and report to the full Committee on any measure or matter referred to it.

(2) No subcommittee of the Committee may, without the Chair's approval, meet or hold a hearing at the same time as a meeting or hearing of the full Committee is being held.

(3) The Chair of each subcommittee shall schedule meetings and hearings of the subcommittee only after consultation with the Chair.

(4) A member of the Committee who is not a member of a particular subcommittee of the Committee may sit with the subcommittee during any of its meetings and hearings, but shall not have authority to vote, cannot be counted for a quorum, and cannot raise a point of order at the meeting or hearing.

Quorum

(g) A quorum of each subcommittee on the Committee shall consist of a majority of the members of the subcommittee for purposes of closing a meeting or hearing of the subcommittee to the public or for ordering a measure or recommendation reported to the full Committee. For all other purposes, one-third of the members of a subcommittee shall constitute a quorum. Any vacancy in the membership of a subcommittee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the subcommittee.

Records

(h) Each subcommittee of the Committee shall provide the full Committee with copies of such records of votes taken in the subcommittee and such other records with respect to the subcommittee as the Chair deems necessary for the Committee to comply with all rules and regulations of the House.

RULE 5—BUDGET AND TRAVEL

Budget

(a) The Chair, in consultation with other members of the Committee, shall prepare for each session of Congress a budget providing amounts for staff, necessary travel, investigation, and other expenses of the Committee and its subcommittees.

Travel

(b)(1) The Chair may authorize travel for any member and any staff member of the Committee in connection with activities or subject matters under the general jurisdiction of the Committee. Before such authorization is granted, there shall be submitted to the Chair in writing the following:

(A) The purpose of the travel.

(B) The dates during which the travel is to occur.

(C) The names of the States or countries to be visited and the length of time to be spent in each.

(D) The names of members and staff of the Committee for whom the authorization is sought.

(2) Members and staff of the Committee shall make a written report to the Chair on any travel they have conducted under this subsection, including a description of their itinerary, expenses, and activities, and of pertinent information gained as a result of such travel.

(3) Members and staff of the Committee performing authorized travel on official business shall be governed by applicable laws, resolutions, and regulations of the House and of the Committee on House Administration.

RULE 6—STAFF

In general

(a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this rule, a Staff Director of the Committee, professional and clerical staff of the Committee, and investigating staff of the Committee compensated from funds provided by any expense resolution, shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the Chair and shall work under the general supervision and direction of the Chair.

(2) Except for any staff appointed by the ranking minority party member of a subcommittee (pursuant to subsection (c)) or by any other minority party member of the Committee (pursuant to subsection (b)), all professional and clerical staff provided to the minority party members of the Committee under paragraphs (a)(2) and (b)(2), respectively, of clause 6 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee and shall work under the general supervision and direction of such Member.

Associate staff

(b) Each member of the Committee is authorized to designate one person, whom the Chair shall appoint to the professional or clerical staff of the Committee and who shall work under the general supervision and direction of the member. The type of staff to which such a person is appointed shall be determined by the Chair, in the case of a person recommended by a majority party member, and shall be determined by the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee, in the case of a person recommended by a minority party member.

Subcommittee staff

(c)(1) The Chair and ranking minority member of each subcommittee of the Committee are each authorized to designate one person, whom the Chair shall appoint to the professional staff of the Committee and who shall work under the general supervision and direction of the Chair or the ranking minority, member, respectively, of the subcommittee.

(2) The Chair may assign investigating staff of the Committee compensated from funds provided by any express resolution to assist in work of a subcommittee of the Committee to the extent the Chair determines it to be appropriate, and any such staff to the extent so assigned shall work under the general supervision and direction of the Chair of the subcommittee.

Compensation of staff

(d)(1) Subject to paragraph (2), the Chair shall fix the compensation of all professional, clerical, and investigating staff of the Committee, as provided by clause 6(c) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(2) Compensation paid to associate staff appointed under subsection (b) shall not exceed 63 per centum of the maximum established in Clause 6(c) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

Certification of staff

(e)(1) To the extent any staff member of the Committee or any of its subcommittees does not work under the supervision and direction of the Chair, the member of the Committee who supervises and directs the staff member's work shall file with the Staff Director of the Committee (not later than the tenth day of each month) a certification regarding the staff member's work for that member for the preceding calendar month.

(2) The certification required by paragraph (1) shall be in such form as the Chair may prescribe, shall identify each staff member by name, and shall state that the work engaged in by the staff member and the duties assigned to the staff member for the member of the Committee with respect to the month in question met the requirements of clause 6 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(3) Any certification of staff of the Committee, or any of its subcommittees, made by the Chair in compliance with any provision of law or regulation shall be made (A) on the basis of the certifications filed under paragraph (1) to the extent the staff is not under the Chair's supervision and direction, and (B) on his own responsibility to the extent the staff is under the Chair's supervision and direction.

RULE 7—COMMITTEE ADMINISTRATION

Reporting

(a) Whenever the Committee authorizes the favorable reporting of a bill or resolution from the Committee—

(1) the Chair or Acting Chair shall report it to the House or designate a member of the Committee to do so, and

(2) in the case of a bill or resolution in which the Committee has original jurisdiction, the Chair shall allow, to the extent that the anticipated floor schedule permits, any member of the Committee a reasonable amount of time to submit views for inclusion in the Committee report on the bill or resolution.

Any such report shall contain all matters required by the Rules of the House of Representatives (or by any provision of law enacted as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House) and such other information as the Chair deems appropriate.

Records

(b)(1) There shall be a transcript made of each regular meeting and hearing of the Committee, and the transcript may be printed if the Chair decides it is appropriate or if a majority of the members of the Committee requests such printing.

(2) The minutes of each executive meeting of the Committee shall be available to all Members of the House of Representatives in compliance with clause 2(e)(2) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(3) The Committee shall keep a record of all actions of the Committee and of its subcommittees. The record shall contain all information required by clause 2(e)(1) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives and shall be available for public inspection at reasonable times in the offices of the Committee.

Calendars

(c)(1) The Committee shall maintain a Committee Calendar, which shall include all bills, resolutions, and other matters referred to or reported by the Committee and all bills, resolutions, and other matters reported by any other Committee on which a rule has been granted or formally requested. The Calendar shall contain (A) the number, a brief description, and the name of the prinicpal sponsoring Member of each such bill or resolution, (B) the name of the committee or committees which reported such bill or resolution (in the case of measures on which a rule has been granted or formally requested), and (C) such further information as the Chair may direct. The Calendar shall be published periodically, but in no case less often than once in each session of Congress.

(2) The staff of the Committee shall furnish each member of the Committee with a list of all bills or resolutions on which a rule has been formally requested but not yet granted. The list shall be updated each week when the House is in session and shall contain (A) the number, a brief description, and the name of the principal sponsoring Member, of each such bill or resolution, (B) the name of the committee or committees which reported such bill or resolution and the dates of such reports, (C) the date on which a rule was formally requested, and (D) a description (if any) of the rule requested by each such committee.

(3) For purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2), a rule is considered as formally requested when the chairman of a committee which has reported a bill or resolution (or a member of such committee authorized to act on the chairman's behalf) (A) has requested, in writing to the Chair, that a hearing be scheduled on a rule for the consideration of the bill or resolution, and (B) has supplied the Committee with an adequate number of copies of the bill or resolution, as reported, together with the final printed committee report thereon.

Other procedures

(d) The Chair may establish such other Committee procedures and take such actions as may be necessary to carry out these rules or to facilitate the effective operation of the Committee and its subcommittees.

RULE 8—AMENDMENTS TO COMMITTEE RULES

The rules of the Committee may be modified, amended, or repealed by a vote of a majority vote of its members, but only if written notice of the proposed change has been provided to each such member at least 48 hours before the time of the meeting at which the vote on the change occurs.●

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to rule XI, clause 2(a) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, I submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the rules of the Committee on the District of Columbia for the 99th Congress, adopted by the committee on February 7, 1985:

RULES GOVERNING PROCEDURES, COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, NINETY-NINTH CONGRESS [1]

A. IN GENERAL

(1) The Rules of the House are the rules of this Committee and each subcommittee so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day and a motion to dispense with the first reading (in full) of a bill or resolution, if printed copies are available, are nondebatable motions of high privilege in the Committee and subcommittees.

(2) Each subcommittee is a part of this Committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of the Committee and to its rules insofar as applicable. The rules of the Committee shall be the rules of its subcommittees.

(3) No major investigation by a subcommittee shall be initiated without approval of the Chair of the Committee or the majority of the full Committee.

(4) Any Committee Member, when recognized by the Chair, may address the Committee on any bill, motion, or other matter under consideration before the Committee. The Chair may limit to 5 minutes the time of any such member, after giving due consideration to the importance of the subject matter and to the length of time available. Any House Member not a member of the Committee may testify as a witness at any hearing of the Committee or a subcommittee, or may submit a statement for the official record.

B. REGULAR MEETING DAYS

(1) The full Committee shall have its regular meetings on the first Tuesday in each calendar month at 10:00 A.M. When the House is in recess, the regular monthly meeting of the Committee may be dispensed with at the discretion of the Chair upon notice of such action to all Members of the Committee.

(2) The Committee shall meet, for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the Committee or for the transaction of other Committee business, on all regular meeting days fixed by the Committee.

(3) Subcommittee Chair shall set meeting and hearing dates after consultation with the Chair and other subcommittee Chair with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of Committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

[1] Adopted by Committee. Printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

C. ADDITIONAL AND SPECIAL MEETINGS

(1) The Chair may call and convene, as he or she considers necessary, additional meetings of the Committee for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the Committee or for the conduct of other committee business. The Committee shall meet for such purposes pursuant to that call of the Chair.

(2) If at least three members of the Committee desire that a special meeting of the Committee be called by the Chair, those members may file in the offices of the Committee their written request to the Chair for that special meeting. Such request shall specify the measure or matter to be considered. Immediately upon the filing of the request, the clerk of the Committee shall notify the Chair of the filing of the request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of the request, the Chair does not call the requested special meeting, to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the Members of the Committee may file in the offices of the Committee their written notice that a special meeting of the Committee will be held, specifying the date and hour of, and the measure or matter to be considered at, the special meeting. The Committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the clerk of the Committee shall notify all members of the Committee that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour and the measure or matter to be considered; and only the measure or matter specified in that notice may be considered at that special meeting.

D. RANKING MAJORITY MEMBER TO PRESIDE IN ABSENCE OF CHAIR

If the Chair of the Committee or subcommittee is not present at any meeting of the Committee or subcommittee, the ranking Member of the majority party on the Committee or subcommittee who is present shall preside at the meeting.

E. COMMITTEE RECORDS AND ROLLCALLS

(1) The Committee shall keep a complete record of all Committee action which shall include a record of the votes on any question on which a rollcall vote is demanded. The result of each rollcall vote shall be made available by the Committee for inspection by the public at reasonable times in the offices of the Committee. Information so available for public inspection shall include a description of the amendment, motion, order, or other proposition and the name of each Member voting for and each Member voting against such amendment, motion, order, or proposition, and whether by proxy or in person, and the names of those Members present but not voting.

A record vote in subcommittee may be had upon the request of any subcommittee member, and in full Committee upon the request of any Committee member.

(2) Records of hearings before the Committee shall not be available to the public for quotation of any Member until after such Member has had an opportunity to examine and approve such hearing records.

(3) All Committee and subcommittee hearings, records, data, charts, and files shall be kept separate and distinct from the congressional office records of the Chair of the Committee or a subcommittee; and such records shall be the property of the House and all Members of the House shall have access thereto.

F. PROXIES

A vote by any member in the Committee or in any subcommittee may be cast by proxy, but shall be in writing, shall assert that the member is absent an official business or is otherwise unable to be present at the meeting of the Committee, shall designate the person who is to execute the proxy authorization, and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto; except that a Member may authorize a general proxy only for motions to recess, adjourn or other procedural matters. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the Member assigning his or her vote and shall contain the date and time of day that the proxy is signed. Proxies may not be counted for a quorum.

G. OPEN MEETINGS AND HEARINGS

(1) Each meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, of the Committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public except when the Committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public; provided, however, that no person other than members of the Committee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to open committee hearings which are provided for by (2) of this rule, or to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

(2) Each hearing conducted by the Committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public except when the Committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives; notwithstanding the requirements of the preceding sentence, or rule H. (2), a majority of those present (but not less than two Members voting in the affirmative).

(A) may vote to close the hearing for the sole purpose of discussing whether testimony or evidence to be received would endanger the national security or defame, degrade, or incriminate any person; or

(B) may vote to close the hearing if testimony or evidence to be received would defame, degrade, or incriminate any person; provided, however, that the Committee or subcommittee may by the same procedure vote to close one subsequent day of hearing.

H. QUORUM

(1) The number of Members to constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence in full Committee or subcommittee is two.

(2) One-third of the Committee or a subcommittee shall constitute a quorum for other meetings, except that a majority of the Committee or subcommittee shall constitute a quorum for the purposes of reporting a measure and closing a meeting to the public.

I. CALLING AND INTERROGATING WITNESSES

(1) Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee or a subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority party

Members on the Committee shall be entitled, upon request to the Chair of the Committee or subcommittee by a majority of the minority party Members before the completion of the hearing, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(2) The Committee and subcommittee shalls apply the five-minute rule in the interrogation of witnesses in any hearing until such time as each Member of the Committee or subcommittee who so desires has had an opportunity to question each witness.

(3) Committee Members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the Chair for that purpose.

(4) All questions put to the witnesses before the Committee shall be pertinent to the bill or other subject matter before the Committee for consideration.

(5) Insofar as is practicable, each witness who is to appear must file with the Committee (in advance of his or her appearance) a written statement of the proposed testimony and limit the oral presentation at such appearance to a brief summary of his or her argument.

J. INVESTIGATE HEARING PROCEDURES

(1) The Chair of the Committee or subcommittee at an investigate hearing shall announce in an opening statement the subject of the investigation.

(2) A copy of the Committee rules and this clause shall be made available to each witness.

(3) Witnesses at investigative hearings may be accompanied by their own counsel for the purpose of advising them concerning their constitutional rights.

(4) The Chair of the Committee or subcommittee may punish breaches of order and decorum, and of professional ethics on the part of counsel, by censure and exclusion from the hearings; and the full Committee may cite the offender to the House for contempt.

(5) Whenever it is asserted that the evidence or testimony at an investigatory hearing may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person,

(A) such testimony or evidence shall be presented in executive session, if by a majority of those present, there being in attendance the requisite number required under the rules of the Committee to be present for the purpose of taking testimony, the Committee or subcommittee determines that such evidence or testimony may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person;

(B) the Committee or subcommittee shall proceed to receive such testimony in open session only if a majority of the members of the Committee or subcommittee, a majority being present, determine that such evidence or testimony will not tend to defame, or incriminate any person.

In either case the Committee or subcommittee shall—

(a) afford such person an opportunity voluntarily to appear as a witness; and

(b) receive and dispose of requests from such person to subpoena additional witnesses.

(6) Except as provided in subparagraph (5), the Chair shall receive and the Committee shall dispose of requests to subpoena additional witnesses.

(7) No evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the Committee.

(8) In the discretion of the Committee or subcommittee, witnesses may submit brief and pertinent sworn statements in writing for inclusion in the Record. The Committee or subcommittee is the sole judge of the pertinency of testimony and evidence adduced at its hearing.

(9) A witness may obtain a transcript copy of his testimony given at a public session or, if given at an executive session, when authorized by the Committee.

K. REPORTING BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

(1) No measure or recommendation shall be reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Committee was actually present.

(2) Any Committee Member at a meeting of the full Committee or any Member of the subcommittee involved may make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

(3)(A) Each Committee report shall include in its text a statement of the reported legislation's intent or purpose, need, the results of motions to report, including number of yeas and nays, a five-year cost estimate, oversight statement, inflationary impact statement, any statement required by sections 308(a) and 403 of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, Administration or Departmental position (if any), and changes in existing law, in addition to such other provisions as the Chair deems necessary.

(B) If, at the time of approval of any measure or matter by the Committee, any Member of the Committee gives notice of intention to file supplemental, minority or additional views, that Member shall be entitled to not less than three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) in which to file such views, in writing and signed by that member, with the clerk of the committee. All such views so filed by one or more Members of the Committee shall be included within, and shall be a part of, the report filed by the Committee with respect to that measure or matter. The report of the Committee upon that measure shall be printed in a single volume which—

1. shall include all supplemental, minority, and additional views which have been submitted by the time of the filing of the report, and

2. shall bear upon its cover a recital that any such supplemental, minority, or additional views (and any material submitted pursuant to the requirements of sections 308(a) and 403 of the Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974) are included as part of the report. This subparagraph does not preclude—

(a) the immediate filing or printing of a committee report unless timely request for the opportunity to file supplemental, minority, or additional views has been made as provided by this subparagraph; or

(b) the filing by the Committee of any supplemental report upon any measure or matter which may be required for the correction of any technical error in a previous report made by the Committee upon that measure or matter.

(4)(A) It shall be the duty of the Chair of the Committee to report or cause to be reported promptly to the House any measure approved by the Committee and to take or cause to be taken necessary steps to bring a matter to a vote.

(B) In any event, the report of the Committee on any measure which has been approved by the Committee shall be filed within seven calendar days (exclusive of days on which the House is not in session) after the day on which there has been filed with the clerk of the Committee a written request, signed by a majority of the Members of the Committee, for the reporting of that measure. Upon the filing of any such request, the clerk of the Committee shall transmit immediately to the Chair of the Committee notice of the filing of that request.

(8) Not more than five press photographers shall be permitted to cover a hearing or meeting by still photography. In the selection of these photographers, preference shall be given to photographers from Associated Press Photos and United Press International Newspictures. Each professional staff member appointed under this subparagraph shall be assigned to the Chair and the ranking minority party Member of such Committee, as the Committee considers advisable.

(2) Subject to 2(D) of this rule, whenever a majority of the minority party Members of the Committee so request, not more than six persons may be selected, by majority vote of the minority party Members, for appointment by the Committee as professional staff members from among the number authorized by 2(A)(1) of this rule. The Committee shall appoint any persons so selected whose character and qualifications are acceptable to a majority of the Committee. If the Committee determines that the character and qualifications of any person so selected are unacceptable to the Committee, a majority of the minority party Members may select other persons for appointment by the Committee to the professional staff until such appointment is made. Each professional staff member appointed under this subparagraph shall be assigned to such committee business as the minority party Members of the Committee consider advisable.

(3) The professional staff members of the Committee—

(a) shall be appointed on a permanent basis, without regard to race, creed, sex, or age, and solely on the basis of fitness to perform the duties of their respective positions;

The Committee shall appoint to those positions any person so selected whose character and qualifications are acceptable to a majority of the Committee. The person so appointed shall serve as an additional member of the professional staff or the clerical staff, as the case may be, of the Committee, and shall be paid from the contingent fund, until such a vacancy (other than a vacancy in the position of head of the professional staff, by whatever title designated) occurs, at which time that person shall be deemed to have been appointed to that vacancy. If such vacancy occurs on the professional staff when seven or more persons have been so appointed who are eligible to fill that vacancy, a majority of the minority party Members shall designate which of those persons shall fill that vacancy.

(E) Each staff member appointed pursuant to a request by minority party Members under paragraph (A) or (B), and each staff member appointed to assist minority party Members of a Committee pursuant to an expense resolution, shall be accorded equitable treatment with respect to the fixing of his or her rate of pay, the assignment to him or her of work facilities, and the accessibility to him or her of committee records.

(F) Paragraphs (A) and (B) shall not be construed to authorize the appointment of additional professional or clerical staff members of the Committee pursuant to a request under either of such paragraphs by the minority party Members of that committee if six or more professional staff members or four or more clerical staff members provided for in paragraph (A)(1) or paragraph (B)(1) as the case may be, who are satisfactory to a majority of the minority party Members, are otherwise assigned to assist the minority party Members.

If a concurrent resolution of disapproval of a Council Act is introduced in the House during the first 15 legislative days of layover, the resolution shall be referred to the subcommittee of appropriate jurisdiction. If the concurrent resolution is introduced during the last 15 days of congressional layover, that matter shall be kept at the full Committee level with such comments from the subcommittee as they may wish to give.

(2) The Chair may refer a matter simultaneously to two or more subcommittees for concurrent consideration or for consideration in sequence (subject to appropriate time limitations in the case of any subcommittee after the first) or divide the matter into two or more parts (reflecting different subjects and jurisdictions) and refer each such part to a different subcommittee.

(3) Should a subcommittee fail to report back to the full Committee on any measure within a reasonable time, the Chair may withdraw the measure from such subcommittee and report that fact to the full Committee for further disposition. In order to permit the full Committee to take timely action on special resolutions, a subcommittee should complete action on a concurrent resolution of approval of a charter amendment under Section 303(b) of the Home Rule Act not later then 15 calendar days before the expiration of the 35-day period named in the Home Rule Act. The subcommittee should complete action within 12 calendar days of the introduction of a simple resolution of disapproval of a Council Act relating to titles 22, 23 or 24 of the District of Columbia Code under subsection (c)(2) of section 602 of the Home Rule Act.

P. SUBCOMMITTEES

(1) The full Committee shall determine an appropriate ratio of Majority to Minority Members for each subcommittee and shall establish the number of subcommittees, shall fix the jurisdiction of each subcommittee, and shall determine the size of each subcommittee.

(6) Party representation on each subcommittee, including ex-officio members, shall be no less favorable to the Majority Party than the ratio for the full Committee.

Q. GENERAL OVERSIGHT RESPONSIBILITIES

The Committee and each subcommittee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee or the subcommittee, respectively, and the organization and operation of the Federal and District agencies and entities have responsibilities in or for the administration and execution thereof, in order to determine whether such laws and the programs thereunder are being implemented and carried out in accordance with the intent of the Congress and whether such programs should be continued, curtailed, or eliminated. In addition, the Committee and each subcommittee shall review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of the Committee or subcommittee, respectively (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto), and shall on a continuing basis undertake future research and forecasting on matters within the jurisdiction of the Committee or subcommittee, respectively. Each subcommittee is required to conduct oversight in the area of their respective jurisdiction, to assist in carrying out the full Committee's responsibilities under Rule X, cl. 2, of the House of Representatives. The establishment of an oversight subcommittee shall in no way limit the responsibility of the subcommittees with legislative jurisdiction from carrying out their oversight responsibilities.

R. ADDITIONAL FUNCTIONS

(1) The Committee and each subcommittee shall, in its consideration of all bills and joint resolutions of a public character within its jurisdiction, insure that appropriations for continuing programs and activities of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia Government will be made annually to the maximum extent feasible and consistent with the nature, requirements, and objectives of the programs and activities involved. For the purposes of this paragraph, a Government agency includes the organizational units of government listed in clause 7(c) of Rule XIII of the House of Representatives.

(2) The Committee and each subcommittee shall review, from time to time, each continuing program within its jurisdiction for which appropriations are not made annually in order to ascertain whether such program could be modified so that appropriations therefore would be made annually.

S. POINTS OF ORDER

No point of order, other than a point of order that a quorum is not present, against the hearings or business procedures of the Committee shall be sustained unless it is made in a timely fashion (1) at the commencement of the hearing or meeting, or (2) at the time such point of order first occurs. Any point of order not raised in a timely manner in subcommittee shall not be sustained in full Committee.

T. NOTICE OF MEETINGS AND AGENDA

(1) The Committee and each subcommittee shall make public announcement of the date, place and subject matter of any Committees hearing at least one week before the commencement of the hearing. If the Committee determines that there is good cause to begin the hearing sooner, it shall make the announcement at the earliest possible day. Any announcement made under the subparagraph shall be promptly published in the Daily Digest and given to the House Information Systems.

(2) The agenda for all Committee meetings, setting out all items of business to be considered, including a copy of any measure or a summary of any measure and of any subcommittee amendments, shall be furnished each Committee Member by delivery to his or her office at least two full calendar days (excluding Saturday, Sunday and Legal Holidays) before the meeting. This requirement may be waived by a two-thirds vote, a quorum being present, of the Committee.

(3) No bill or other matter shall be brought up for hearing or other consideration except with the approval of the Chair or by a majority of those voting, a quorum being present; provided, that any Member (other than the Chair) making the motion for consideration under this rule has given 2 days' notice in writing to all Members of the Committee.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to rule XI, clause 2(a), of the Rules of the House of Representatives, I submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the rules of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs for the 99th Congress, adopted by the committee on February 7, 1985:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS OF THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 99TH CONGRESS—1985-86

RULE NO. 1—GENERAL PROVISIONS

(a) The Rules of the House are the rules of the committees and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day, and a motion to dispense with the first reading (in full) of a bill or resolution, if printed copies are available, are nondebatable motions of high privilege in committee and subcommittees. Each subcommittee of the committee is a part of the committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of the committee and to its rules so far as applicable.

(b) The committee is authorized at any time to conduct such investigations and studies as it may consider necessary or appropriate in the exercise of its responsibilities under rule X of House Rules and (subject to the adoption of expense resolutions as required by rule XI, clause 5 of House Rules) to incur expenses (including travel expenses) in connection herewith. The ranking minority member of the full committee or the relevant subcommittee shall be notified in advance at such times as any committee funds are expended for investigations and studies involving international travel.

(c) The committee is authorized to have printed and bound testimony and other data presented at hearings held by the committee. All costs of stenographic services and transcripts in connection with any meeting or hearing of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

(d) The committee shall submit to the House, not later than January 2 of each odd-numbered year, a report on the activities of the committee under rules X and XI of House Rules during the Congress ending at noon on January 3 of such year.

(e) The committee's rules shall be published in the Congressional Record not later than 30 days after the Congress convenes in each odd-numbered year.

RULE NO. 2—REGULAR AND SPECIAL MEETINGS: OPEN COMMITTEE MEETINGS

(a) Regular meetings of the committee shall be held on the first Tuesday of each month while the Congress is in session. When the chairman believes that the committee will not be considering any bill or resolution before the full committee and that there is no other business to be transacted at a regular meeting, he will give each member of the committee, as far in advance of the day of the regular meeting as the circumstances makes practicable, a written notice to that effect and no committee meeting shall be held on that day.

(b) The chairman may call and convene, as he considers necessary, additional meetings of the committee for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the committee or for the conduct of other committee business. The committee shall meet for such purpose pursuant to that call of the chairman.

(c) If at least three members of the committee desire that a special meeting of the committee be called by the chairman, those members may file in the offices of the committee their written request to the chairman for that special meeting. Such request shall specify the measure or matter to be considered. Immediately upon the filing of the request, the clerk of the committee shall notify the chairman of the filing of the request. If, within 3 calendar days after the filing of the request, the chairman does not call the requested special meeting to be held within 7 calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the members of the Committee may file in the offices of the committee their written notice that a special meeting of the committee will be held specifying the date and hour thereof, and the measure or matter to be considered at that special meeting. The committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the clerk of the committee shall notify all members of the committee that such meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour and the measure or matter to be considered; and only the measure or matter specified in that notice may be considered at that special meeting.

(d) If the chairman of the committee or subcommittee is not present at any meeting of the committee or subcommittee the ranking member of the majority party on the committee or subcommittee who is present shall preside at that meeting.

(e) The committee may not sit, without special leave, while the House is reading a measure for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

(f)(1) Each meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, of the committee or each subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by roll call vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day be closed to the public: Provided, however, that no person other than members of the committee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to open committee hearings which are provided for by subparagraph (2) of this paragraph, or to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

(2) Each hearing conducted by the committee or each subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by roll call vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives. Notwithstanding the requirements of the preceding sentence, a majority of those present, there being in attendance the requisite number required under the Rules of the Committee to be present for the purpose of taking testimony, (A) may vote to close the hearing for the sole purpose of discussing whether testimony or evidence to be received would endanger the national security or violate subparagraph (g)(5) of Rule 7; or (B) may vote to close the hearing, as provided in subparagraph (g)(5) of Rule 7. The Committee or subcommittee may, by the same procedures specified in this paragraph, vote to close one subsequent day of hearing.

(g) No person other than a Member of Congress, committee staff, or a person from a Member's staff when that Member has an amendment under consideration, may walk in or be seated at the rostrum area of the committee unless the chairman, the chairman of the subcommittee, or a majority of the committee determines otherwise.

RULE NO. 3—RECORDS AND ROLLCALLS

(a) There shall be kept in writing a record of the proceedings of the committee and of each subcommittee, including a record of the votes on any question on which a roll call is demanded. The result of each such roll call vote shall be made available by the committee for inspection by the public at reasonable times in the offices of the committee. Information so available for public inspection shall include a description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition and the name of each member voting for and each member voting against such amendment, motion, order, or proposition, and whether by proxy or in person, and the names of those members present, but not voting. A record vote may be demanded by any three of the members present or, in the apparent absence of a quorum, by any one member.

(b) All committee hearings, records, data, charts, and files shall be kept separate and distinct from the congressional office records of the member serving as chairman of the committee; and such records shall be the property of the House and all Members of the House shall have access thereto.

RULE NO. 4—PROXIES

(a) No vote by any member of the committee or any of its subcommittees with respect to any measure may be cast by proxy unless a proxy authorization is given in writing by the member desiring to cast a proxy, which authorization shall assert that the member is absent on official business or is absent due to personal illness and is thus unable to be present at the meeting of the committee or subcommittee and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the member assigning his/her vote and shall contain the date and time of the day that the proxy is signed. No proxy shall be voted on a motion to adjourn or shall be counted to make a quorum or be voted unless a quorum is present.

(b) Proxies shall be in the following form:

Any subpena issued to carry out the authority of this paragraph shall be issued in accordance with the procedures specified in subparagraph (b)(1). The chairman of the committee or any member designated by the chairman may administer oaths to any witness.

(b)(1) Any subpena issued to carry out any investigation or activity, or any series of investigations or activities, described in (a) shall be issued by the committee, upon the recommendation of a subcommittee or upon the committee's initiative, and any such subpena may only be authorized by a majority of the members of the committee voting, a majority being present. The power to authorize and issue subpenas under this subparagraph may be delegated to the chairman of the committee pursuant to such limitations as the committee may prescribe. Authorized subpenas shall be signed by the chairman of the committee or by any member designated by the committee.

(2) Compliance with any subpena issued by the committee under this subparagraph may be enforced only as authorized or directed by the House.

(c) Each witness who has been subpenaed upon the completion of his testimony before the committee or any subcommittee, may report to the office of counsel of the committee, and there sign appropriate vouchers for travel allowances and attendance fees. if hearings are held in cities other than Wash-

RULE NO. 7—HEARING PROCEDURES

(a) The chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by the committee, and the appropriate subcommittee chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by a subcommittee, shall make public announcement of the date, place, and subject matter at least one week before the commencement of that hearing unless that committee determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date. In the latter event the chairman or the subcommittee chairman whichever the case may be shall make such public announcement at the earliest possible date. The clerk of the committee shall promptly notify all members of the committee, the Daily Digest Clerk of the Congressional Record and the committee scheduling service of the House Information System as soon as possible after such public announcement is made.

(b) Each witness who is to appear before the committee or a subcommittee shall file with the clerk of the committee, at least 24 hours in advance of his appearance, 100 copies of his proposed testimony if the appearance is before a subcommittee, and 175 copies of his proposed testimony if the appearance is before the committee, and the witness may be required to limit his oral presentation to a summary of his statement. This requirement may be waived by the Chairman of the Committee or appropriate subcommittee, after consultation with the appropriate ranking minority member, when it is deemed by said Chairman to be in the best interest of the committee or subcommittee. This requirement shall not be mandatory if a witness is given less than seven days' notice prior to a hearing.

(c) When any hearing is conducted by the committee or any subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority party members on the committee shall be entitled, upon request to the chairman by a majority of those minority members before the completion of such hearing, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(f) Committee members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the chairman for that purpose, and only for a 5-minute period until all members present have had an opportunity to question a witness. The 5-minute period for questioning a witness by any one member can be extended only with the unanimous consent of all members present. The questioning of witnesses in both the full and subcommittee hearings shall be initiated by the chairman, followed by the ranking minority party member and all other members alternating between the majority and minority. In recognizing members to question witnesses in this fashion, the chairman shall take into consideration the ratio of the majority to minority members present and shall establish the order of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority.

In addition, the Oversight Subcommittee shall review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of the committee (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto), and shall on a continuing basis undertake future research and forecasting on matters within the jurisdiction of the committee. The Oversight Subcommittee shall in no way limit the responsibility of the subcommittees from carrying out their oversight responsibilities.

(3) The staff members appointed pursuant to the provisions of subparagraphs (1) and (2) shall be compensated at a rate determined by the subcommittee chairman not to exceed 75 per centum of the maximum established in paragraph (c) of clause 6 of the House Rule XI, provided, however, a staff person appointed by a ranking minority member shall be compensated at a rate not to exceed that paid his or her majority party staff counterpart.

(4) Subparagraphs (1), (2) and (3) shall apply to six subcommittees only, and no member shall appoint more than one person pursuant to the above provisions.

(5) The staff positions made available to the subcommittee chairmen and ranking minority party members pursuant to subparagraphs (1) and (2) shall be made available from the staff positions provided under clause 6 of House Rule XI unless such staff positions are made available pursuant to a primary or additional expense resolution.

Such prior authorization shall be given by the Chairman only upon the representation by the applicable chairman of the subcommittee in writing setting forth those items enumerated in (1), (2), (3), and (4), of paragraph (a) and in addition thereto setting forth that subcommittee funds are available to cover the expenses of the person or persons being authorized by the subcommittee chairman to undertake the travel and that there has been compliance where applicable with Rule 12 of the committee.

(c)(1) In the case of travel outside the United States of members and staff of the committee or of a subcommittee for the purpose of conducting hearings, investigations, studies, or attending meetings and conferences involving activities or subject matter under the legislative assignment of the committee or pertinent subcommittee, prior authorization must be obtained from the chairman, or, in the case of a subcommittee, from the subcommittee chairman and the chairman. Before such authorization is given, there shall be submitted to the chairman in writing, a request for such authorization. Each request, which shall be filed in a manner that allows for a reasonable period of time for review before such travel is scheduled to begin, shall include the following:

(A) the purpose of the travel;

(B) the dates during which the travel will occur;

(C) the names of the countries to be visited and the length of time to be spent in each;

(2) Requests for travel outside the United States may be initiated by the chairman of the full committee, the ranking minority member of the full committee, or the chairman of a subcommittee (except that individuals may submit a request to the chairman for the purpose of attending a conference or meeting).

(3) At the conclusion of any hearing, investigation, study, meeting or conference for which travel outside the United States has been authorized pursuant to this rule, each subcommittee (members and staff attending meetings or conferences) shall submit a written report to the chairman covering the activities and other pertinent observations or information gained as a result of such travel.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA AT 200

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, shortly after the close of the American Revolution, the Georgia General Assembly meeting in the southern port city of Savannah, took the first step in establishing public-sponsored higher education in America. On that day in 1785, Georgia became the first of the growing United States to grant a charter for a university supported by the State. This decision by Georgia legislators set a precedent whereby States would provide for the higher education of their citizens.

On January 27 of this year, the University of Georgia celebrated its 200th birthday. Since the day in 1801 when 10 of the university's first students earned bachelor of arts degrees, the University of Georgia has grown to be a major teaching, research and service institution. Covering some 42,000 acres, this fine institution serves over 25,000 students with its 13 colleges and 1,800 faculty members. In addition, off-campus centers and experiment stations carry the university's influence through the entire structure of education in Georgia by leading the pace of achievement and creating a climate of intellectual and cultural development for all units of the State's university system.

Mr. Speaker, I can attest to the quality of this institution from the many years I spent there as a student. I earned my bachelor of arts degree from the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Georgia in 1965. I continued my education there and received my juris doctorate from the university's school of law in 1967. In 1966, I had the honor of serving as president of the student body. Over the years, I have realized the importance in my life of the quality education this fine university afforded me.

The following is an article written by a distinguished University of Georgia graduate, Jasper Dorsey. "The University of Georgia at 200" appeared in the January 1985 edition of Delta Airlines' Sky magazine, of which he is a contributing editor. Mr. Dorsey spent some 15 years working in Washington, DC, with American Telephone & Telegraph. Now retired as vice president of Georgia operations from Southern Bell, Mr. Dorsey lives in Atlanta, GA. He is generally recognized as one of the University of Georgia's most loyal and dedicated alumni. Mr. Dorsey has also served as president of the University of Georgia Alumni Association and is a member of the Sphinx Honor Society, the highest honor any student or alumnus can obtain. His numerous civic and charitable activities are legend. His article on the University of Georgia's bicentennial celebration emphasizes the importance of this anniversity not only to the State of Georgia, but to the concept of public-sponsored education in America as we know it today.

THE UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA AT 200

(By Jasper Dorsey)

January 27, 1985, marks the 200th birthday of the University of Georgia. On that day in 1785, Georgia's General Assembly in Savannah approved a charter for the first state institution of higher learning in the fledgling United States.

But this bicentennial celebrates more than just a 200th birthday. It is a celebration of the establishment of public-sponsored higher education in America, one of the nation's greatest innovations and most significant ideas. It commemorates a revolution in higher education; before this, the few colleges that existed were church schools.

The success of state institutions of higher learning has been a major factor in making the American educational system the envy of the world. There are currently about 1,500 state universities and colleges in the U.S., and all have followed Georgia's example.

For Georgia's leaders to start a state university was an incredible event, considering the state had a population of less than 80,000 and was the weakest, youngest, and least populous of the 13 states at the time. The Colony had been founded only in 1733. Moreover, nine-tenths of the state was controlled by Indians.

The real founding might logically go back a year earlier to February 25, 1784, when the Georgia legislature appointed eight trustees and granted 40,000 acres of land in Washington and Franklin counties to endow a "college or seminary of learning."

Even more remarkable was that it happened only five months after the treaty of peace had granted the U.S. independence. When peace came, the economy was in shambles. Remember, too, that the Continental Congress still governed the infant nation, there was yet to be a Constitutional Convention, and George Washington was elected President several years later.

The answer to why it happended is fascinating. Before and after the revolution, there had been a sizeable migration from Virginia, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and Connecticut into the state. Among the new residents were individuals of exceptional ability, education, and leadership who saw north and middle Georgia as areas of great opportunity. The 1790 census showed nearly half of Georgia's 82,000 population lived in the northeast section of the state.

One of these exceptional men was Abraham Baldwin, who came to help start a college by invitation of Governor Lyman Hall, a Yale graduate. Baldwin, born in 1754, graduated from Yale in 1772, studied for the ministry, and was licensed to preach in 1775. He taught at Yale, and subsequently took a chaplaincy in the Revolutionary Army. Admitted to the Bar at war's end, he came to Georgia at age 31. Baldwin was chosen from Wilkes County as one of the eight trustees of the lands set apart for the University in 1784. He was elected to the legislature in 1785, then to the Continental Congress. He also helped draft the U.S. Constitution, then served in the U.S. House and Senate.

The University of Georgia's Charter, drafted by Baldwin, was adopted on January 27, 1785. Two governing bodies were established: a Board of Visitors and a Board of Trustees. Together, they were called the "Senatus Academicus of the University of Georgia." The Visitors were the Governor, Superior Court Judges, and the State Senators; the Trustees were composed of the old Board of Landlords, with six new members.

The concept included all elementary schools, with the University at the top. All schools receiving state aid were part of the university. No person was to be excluded because of religious denomination. It produced an overall plan of education free of sectarian or religious control. This was unique.

The preamble of Baldwin's Charter gives eloquent reasons why the state needed a college:

"As it is the distinguishing happiness of free governments that civil Order should be the Result of choice and not necessity, and the common wishes of the People become the Laws of the Land, their public prosperity and even existence very much depends upon suitably forming the minds and morals of their Citizens. When the Minds of people in general are viciously disposed and unprincipled and their Conduct disorderly, a free government will be attended with greater Confusions and with Evils more horrid than the wild, uncultivated State of Nature. It can only be happy where the public principles and Opinions are properly directed and the Manners regulated. This is an influence beyond the Stretch of Laws and punishments and can be claimed only by Religion and Education. I should therefore be among the first objects of those who wish well to the national prosperity to encourage and support the principles of Religion and Morality, and early to place the youth under the forming hand of Society that by instruction they may be moulded to the love of Virtue and good Order."

To put it simply, they believed a stable, effective government of the people, by the people, and for the people, could only be maintained if those people were educated. It was a revolutionary idea, indeed. It was also leadership at its best.

The war's devastation had so impoverished Georgia that the land could not be sold to raise funds. There was wrangling, too, over the proper site for the school.

A high hill near a spot known as Cedar Sholas on the Oconee River was selected as the place from which "knowledge should go out to the people." John Milledge, friend to Thomas Jefferson and member of the Senatus Academicus, bought 633 acres he was particularly pleased with, because of the hill and its fine spring of water which flowed down the side. This he gave to the University. Since the idea of an educated citizenry came from ancient Greece, what better name for the town than Athens?

Josiah Meigs, formerly a student of Baldwin's at Yale and a professor there, was employed at a salary of $1,500 per annum and given $400 to move his family to Athens. On June 16, 1801, Baldwin resigned the presidency in favor of Meigs, who assumed the awesome task of building a college in this forest on the edge of civilization. Meigs, a classmate of Noah Webster at Yale, was equal to the challenge. He got permission from the Cherokee Indians to bring materials through their boundaries. Classes were opened in 1801. Ten earned A.B. degrees in 1804.

A permanent building, named Franklin College (after Benjamin Franklin) was half-completed in 1805 and finished the next year. It was a large, three-story brick structure patterned after the main building at Yale. "Better accommodations for students can't be found in any college in the United States," announced the proud president. They even had an insurance policy.

North Carolina chartered a college almost five years after Georgia, but was able to admit students in 1795 because the older state had greater resources. South Carolina opened a college in 1805. All were small; even the oldest, Puritan Harvard, had only three professors and a president. Congregationalist Yale had only 100 students in 1795.

The administrations of the Reverend Moses Waddel (1819-1829) and Alonzo Church (1829-1859) were greatly significant. Since the measure of any university is the performance of its graduates, consider the achievements of the college graduates from 1821-1844: one U.S. Supreme Court Justice; two U.S. Senators; 11 Congressmen; one U.S. Cabinet member; one Speaker of the U.S. House; 11 Justices of State Supreme Courts; seven Governors; six University and College Presidents; four Ministers to foreign nations; four General Officers in the Confederate Army; three world-famed authors; and one renowned doctor. All from a mere 494 graduates. One of the authors was Thomas R.R. Cobb, '41, who codified the English Common Law into Cobb's Digest. He was 35. The great doctor was Crawford W. Long, '35, who discovered anesthesia, and ranks with Pasteur, Lister, and Jenner in the annals of medical history. One of the University presidents, John Le Conte, was the founder of the University of California.

The William E. Boggs Administration (1888-1899) recruited an exceptional faculty, which in turn produced a great number of extraordinary alumni for a period of 50 years. One of these teachers was a famous scientist named Charles Herty, class of '86. He invented a new technique for extracting resin from pines without destroying the trees, and demonstrated that slash pine made excellent paper. He then greatly enhanced the naval stores business and created a vast new paper industry. Boggs also brought intercollegiate athletics to Georgia; Herty became football coach in 1892.

How is UGA performing today, with its 25,000 students, 1,888 faculty, and 131,725 alumni? It's world-class in research and other areas.

Its public service programs are perhaps the largest and most comprehensive conducted by any U.S. institution. In 1984, the W. K. Kellogg Foundation, impressed with the stewardship of its 1953 grant for establishing the Georgia Center for Continuing Education, provided UGA with an additional $8.4 million to establish a National Center for Leadership Development in Adult and Continuing Education. With added state funding, $15 million will go to the Center.

UGA athletic programs have prospered, too. In 1984 alone they produced NCAA championships in men's and women's tennis, women's golf, and men's 400 meter relay track. At the Olympics, UGA athletes won gold metals on both the men's and women's basketball teams. The University became a national football power long ago. Athletic director and head football coach Vince Dooley let the Bulldogs to a 21-year record of 170-61-7 through half the '84 season. He has the nation's best score card for the four years since 1980 (43-4-1), including the 1980 national championship.

Under President Fred C. Davison, UGA is launching a bold initiative as it enters its third century of academic leadership, research, and service. One venture is the establishment of a center for research excellence in advanced computer technology to consolidate UGA's recent ascendance in large, high-performance computer systems.

Only three other U.S. universities have one supercomputer. UGA has two: a Central Data Corp. CYBER 205, and a CYBER PLUS, giving it a leading role in supercomputer development, with the software to match. ETA Systems Inc., is locating its software development division at UGA as a result.

In addition to eminence in genetics, another research example involves biomass, organic material produced by living organisms. Scientists at UGA have achieved a breakthrough in all aspects of production and conversion into food, fiber, and energy. Because Georgia has the geography, climate, and water resources which few states can match, its economy and people can accrue huge financial benefits. The goal is unlimited in creating a new economic base that's nonextractive.

Upon the 200th anniversary of this revolution in higher education, UGA is still on a roll. New ideas—"Those immortal children of the mind"—are being created, old and new mysteries explored; so the pure excitement which attends all such great adventures continues to rise, undiminished.●

NATIONWIDE CENTER TO MEET TELECOMMUNICATIONS NEEDS OF SPEECH AND HEARING-IMPAIRED CITIZENS ESTABLISHED IN RESTON, VA

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I recently attended the dedication ceremonies for a new nationwide TDD Center established by AT&T in Reston, VA, in my congressional district. I want to bring this new center's services to the attention of my colleagues and commend AT&T for providing this valuable service for the Nation's speech and hearing-impaired citizens.

AT&T has established two nationwide centers to meet the special equipment and long distance telecommunications needs of speech and hearing-impaired persons, the one recently established in Reston and a second center located in New Jersey.

Account representatives at the company's Nationwide TDD Center in Reston are trained to respond to inquiries from TDD users on a variety of long distance services and promotions, including billing problems.

TDD's [telecommunications devices for the deaf] are used by the speech and hearing-impaired to communicate over telephone lines. Basically, a TDD user sends a written, rather than verbal message, from one machine to another.

TDD users can reach the Nationwide TDD Center by dialing toll free 1-800-222-4474—TDD only. Citizens without a speech or hearing impairment can continue to find out about AT&T long distance services by dialing 1-800-222-0300.

In addition to long distance, the company also has a National Special Needs Center in Parsippany, NJ, to deal with questions about equipment for the speech and hearing-impaired. Customers can reach the National Special Needs Center by dialing toll free 1-800-833-3232 (TDD only) or 1-800-233-1222—voice only.●

OUR TAX LAWS

HON. SHERWOOD L. BOEHLERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, the IRS has demonstrated again its never-ending ability to bungle simple tax laws. I am referring to the burdensome, time-consuming requirement that businesses and individuals who take tax deductions for autos and other property used in their daily work keep detailed records of their use.

Congress slipped a provision requiring "adequate contemporaneous records" into law without ever discussing the idea in either of the tax-writing committees, and then left it up to the IRS to write in the details. What a mistake. The original IRS regulations required a journal with separate entries made every time business property, such as an auto, truck or personal computer, is used for any purpose. The entries have to include the date of each use, the name of the user, the number of miles driven or the amount of time used, and the specific purpose of the use. Any personal use of the vehicle, such as a run to the McDonald's for lunch, would have to be equally well-documented.

Now, in response to the flood of justifiably angry mail that you and I and the Treasury have received, the IRS has simplified those recordkeeping requirements. Now we have four different categories of usage, each with its own definitions, rules, requirements, and limits. Some simplicity.

Mr. Speaker, the hassles of complying with these regulations fall not just on a major corporation like AT&T, with more than 22,000 service vehicles on the road—and I ask you to consider the enormous cost that the consumer would pay to keep track of all those vehicles—they also fall on every farmer with a pickup truck, every salesperson, electrician, plumber, and repair person with a car or truck, and on every young entrepreneur with a new personal computer. The burden will fall heaviest on those small businesses that are the backbone of our economy, and the spearhead of our economic recovery.

These people do not have the time to keep detailed diaries for the Federal Government. The average American pays his fair share of taxes, complies with the law, and doesn't need this form of Big Brother harassment.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support all efforts to return to the previous standard of "adequate records or * * * sufficient evidence corroborating his own statement," and repeal that provision of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 which calls for "adequate contemporaneous records."●

LEGAL SERVICES FUNDING AND EDWIN MEESE'S ATTORNEY FEES

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I want to include the list of States that receive less or equivalent funding to Mr. Meese's attorney fees of $720,924 to provide legal services to all the poor people in the State. Mr. Meese and the Reagan administration have opposed funding for the Legal Services Corporation in five budget requests, but ask the taxpayers to pay his legal fees. Is Mr. Meese more worthy of legal representation than all the poor in six States?

North Dakota—$721,257 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.

South Dakota—$670,104 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.

Nevada—$555,456 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.

New Hampshire—$676,815 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.

Vermont—$643,635 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.

Delaware—$533,510 in fiscal year 1985 LSC funding.●

KIM DAE JUNG

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, Kim Dae Jung, one of the foremost leaders of the political opposition in South Korea, is today returning to his homeland.

His return is a turning point for democracy in South Korea.

It is also an occasion for Americans to reaffirm our commitment to human rights and democracy.

Too often it is tacitly assumed that standing up for the principles of democracy and human rights is something that must be balanced against American security interests. I say that American principles and American security are in harmony, not in tension.

We learned in the Philippines, we learned in Nicaragua, and we learned in Iran that when we compromise on our principles for illusory short-term security interests, we invite catastrophe for our principles and for our strategic interests as well.

There is only one standard for human rights. And that standard applies to every person in the world.

It applies to people in the United States, and it applies to people in Korea. It applies to people in the Soviet Union, in Chile, in El Salvador, in South Africa, in Afghanistan, and in Poland.

We cannot measure human rights with a flexible standard.

And we cannot give the people of the world the impression that we believe in human rights for our adversaries, but not our friends.

Our position must be clear, strong and unmistakeable: Friends of America are friends of human rights.

I welcome the Chun Doo Hwan government's announcement that Kim will not be imprisoned on his return. That is a good start. But it is a start on a journey of a thousand miles toward full democracy in Korea.

To Mr. Kim, I wish Godspeed and good luck on his return, and more importantly, in the months and years to come. It is my hope that his return to the public life of South Korea will form part of the transition to full democracy in that country.●

IRAN RENOUNCES PROVISIONS OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, congressional human rights caucus calls attention to recent actions by the Khomeini regime which greatly increases the jeopardy facing the Baha'i community in Iran.

The Iranian Government has announced the adoption of a so-called law requiring prisoners to sign a pledge denying possession of any object referring to the Baha'i faith. Any prisoner found with religious objects will be considered among those "who war against God." This phrase is often used by the revolutionary regime to signify a crime deserving the death penalty. Even without this law, over 170 Baha'is have been murdered, and hundreds have been imprisoned as a result of their faith. The horrible implications of this new law on the Baha'is, including increased executions and imprisonment, can only be imagined.

Another incredible and unconscionable development occurred at the United Nations on December 7, 1984, when Iran's ambassador announced that his country would not hesitate to violate provisions of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. Iran is the first nation ever to deny the validity of the declaration in the 36 years since it was adopted.

I urge my colleagues to join the caucus in renouncing these recent actions by the Iranian Government and urge them to raise their voices in protest against the abuses suffered by Iran's Baha'i community.●

THE STATE OF THE UNION

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues join me in commending the President for a State of the Union Address that was full of substance and hope for all Americans. The President is to be praised for his accomplishments during the past 4 years. He rightly challenged Congress and the American people to stand by him and work with him to build an even better America in the future.

By all standards, America is stronger, freer and more secure than before. The President is justly proud of American's accomplishments during the past few years. There has been robust growth in the economy, with the lowest inflation rate in many years. New jobs have been created and unemployment is down. This industrial giant is again awakening and we are witnessing the miracles of a free society. The President's efforts to lower income tax have borne fruit. More, however, must be done.

The Congress must help the President in his continuing efforts to start more businesses in order to create more jobs. Our country's depressed urban areas can be reborn with the proposed enterprise zones concept. The President's tax simplification proposals will further stimulate our Nation's economic progress.

In the past few years, we as a nation have regained our confidence and have reestablished credibility with our allies around the world. We have extended a helping hand to underdeveloped Third World nations with trade and assistance and have helped them foster economic development through personal incentives. We have also assisted the struggling democracies in Central America and have curtailed some of the Sandinistas' efforts to export its failed revolution to the region. How can any democratic nation idly stand by and watch its democratic neighbors to the south be slowly absorbed into the Cuban-Nicaraguan sphere of influence? More must be done. We must help the determined freedom fighters in this hemisphere as well as assist those working to regain their homeland, Afghanistan, from the grasp of the Russian bear.

In a difficult and threatening world, we must be realistic. We must maintain a sound defensive posture. I am confident that our recent military rebuilding efforts have convinced the Soviets to come to the arms control bargaining table. I wish the President well in the upcoming negotiations in Geneva. Let us hope that the Soviets can be convinced that an arms race is sheer lunacy. We must challenge the Soviets to show their commitment to arms control by actions, not just by words, during this important negotiating period.

I support the President in asking that we in the Congress join together to make the second American revolution a reality. By working with him as patriotic Americans, we can make America a better, more prosperous and more secure nation. Much remains to be done. The choice is ours. Our efforts can make a difference in the direction that this great Nation takes. I believe that all of us will accept this challenge.

The President is to be commended for the tone and thrust of his address. He needs our support in the difficult years ahead. I am confident that all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will join me in saluting President Reagan's accomplishments and committing ourselves to a joint attack on the problems which trouble our Nation.●

CONDITIONS OF LAND CONSOLIDATION BETWEEN NANA REGIONAL CORP. AND THE UNITED STATES

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to authorize and ratify the terms and conditions of a land consolidation and exchange between NANA Regional Corp., Inc., a corporation organized pursuant to the provisions of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, and the United States, acting through the Department of the Interior. The agreement negotiated by NANA and the Secretary is, by its own terms, specifically subject to authorization and ratification by Congress before it becomes effective.

The exchange will accomplish three major objectives of concern to the United States. First, it will enhance the opportunities for NANA to fulfill the economic purposes of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act by the development of NANA's Red Dog Mine, a major lead-zinc deposit, and thus provide for the social and economic needs of NANA's shareholders.

Second, the exchange will benefit the Krusenstern National Monument and therefore the interest of the public in the ownership and management of public lands.

Finally, the exchange will benefit the United States, because of the development of Red Dog will increase U.S. recoverable reserves of zinc by more than 33 percent, from 25 million tons to almost 40 million tons of metal. When in full production, Red Dog will produce 300,000 tons of zinc per year, almost doubling U.S. annual production. U.S. mines now produce less than one-third of the annual zinc requirements of the United States of 1 million tons and Red Dog will increase annual production to two-thirds of that amount. In addition, our balance of payments will be helped, for exports will total about $250 million a year in current dollars, about one-third of which will be with Japan.

The background is this: NANA, pursuant to the Settlement Act, selected and received lands that contain a major lead-zinc deposit. NANA negotiated an agreement with Cominco Alaska to develop its deposits, known as the Red Dog Mine. Timely development of the deposits is extremely important to NANA if its Native shareholders are to enjoy all of the potential benefits of the Settlement Act. It is estimated that when fully developed, the mine will employ approximately 400 individuals, most of whom will be residents of the NANA region and NANA shareholders. The estimated life of the mine is 50 years, and the annual income from these jobs is estimated to be approximately $15 million.

At the present time, there is no economic base within the NANA region that can offer even remotely sufficient job opportunities to the residents, with the result that many seek employment outside the region, with all of the attendant dislocation. Development of the Red Dog Mine will change that.

The mine is landlocked, and it is located north of the Cape Krusenstern National Monument. To develop the mine, an access road and port site must be constructed.

A September 1984 environmental impact statement for the Red Dog Mine project determined that the environmentally preferred as well as economically acceptable route was across the monument.

NANA owns lands and conveyance rights in lands totaling approximately 195,043 acres within the monument. While not all of the lands subject to selection by NANA within the monument ultimately will be conveyed to NANA, it is anticipated that substantial acreage will be.

In order to facilitate access to the Red Dog Mine, NANA proposed a land exchange to the Department, whereby NANA would exchange lands conveyed to it and lands subject to conveyance to it within the monument for other lands within the monument. These lands then could be used for the environmentally perferred and economically accepted access road. All required Federal and State permits would still be needed, however, before the road could be constructed. While access could be sought across the monument pursuant to title XI of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, by what in effect is a Federal right-of-way, title XI is an untested procedure for obtaining congressional approval of a right-of-way, and NANA believes at this time that it is in NANA's best interest to seek a legislative land exchange. That will eliminate any uncertainty attendant on a title XI application. However, it is in NANA's best interest only if the legislation ratifying and authorizing the exchange is enacted promptly.

Ths proposed exchange consists of the following major provisions:

First, a consolidation of land ownership into contiguous patterns that would provide administrative and resource management benefits to the United States and provide NANA with a block of land meeting its access needs.

Second, NANA would receive: (a) title to approximately 62,084 acres of Federal lands within the monument and 600 acres of limited subsurface estate, concentrating its holdings at the northwestern and southeastern corners of the monument; (b) easements for two winter use trails between Kivalina and Noatak across the monument and other Federal lands; and (c) title to approximately 1,915.25 acres outside the monument. NANA would also take conveyance to 31,884.67 acres of lands in the northwest corner of the monument to which it already has vested rights pursuant to ANCSA. This would consolidate NANA's in-holdings within the monument.

Third, the United States would receive from NANA:

(a) Conveyance of 1,345 acres of coastal land and relinquishment of selections and selection rights to approximately 103,338 acres within the monument. Coastal land is more important from an archeological standpoint and having this land in Federal ownership is important;

(b) A grant in perpetuity of an easement and public use and occupancy rights for a 5-acre administrative tract at the Onion Portage Archeological District at Kobuk Valley National Park;

(c) Equitable servitudes and conservation easements for the protection and study of resource values on 10,942 acres of land near Sheshalik—an important cultural resource area along the coast;

(d) Interests and easements for the protection and study of resource values within the 65,274-acre block which would be crossed by the Red Dog Mine road. These include protections which are essentially the same as would be attached to an approved title XI right-of-way;

(e) Trail easements providing for public access across NANA lands to monument lands; and

(f) For purposes of administrative convenience and to effect the land consolidation within the monument, NANA will take conveyance to 31,884.67 acres of Settlement Act selections within the northwest corner of the monument. This "spent" acreage entitlement may diminish NANA's potential conveyances within other units of conservation systems within the NANA region.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the exchange clearly benefits NANA by facilitating development of its Red Dog Mine and benefits and protects the interests of the United States. It provides the United States an opportunity to reduce private inholdings in the Cape Krusenstern National Monument, consolidate land ownership patterns within the monument, and it resolves the long-term status of major portions of the Federal and non-Federal lands. It provides for manageable land units and gains additional protective and study provisions that might not otherwise exist for park resources on NANA's private land holdings. Easements also are established which provide for general public access to Federal lands and waters and an administrative site is provided at a key location in the Kobuk Valley National Park.

The agreement also protects vital subsistence values. NANA is most sensitive to the subsistence needs of its people and has provided for this protection both in the agreement NANA negotiated with Cominco and in the land exchange negotiated with the Department. Section 810 of the Alaska National Interests Land Conservation Act requires that if an exchange such as this were accomplished administratively, the agency head or his designee must evaluate the effect of such action on subsistence uses and needs, the availability of other lands for the purposes sought to be achieved and other alternatives which would reduce or eliminate the disposition of public lands needed for subsistence purposes. A subsistence evaluation was prepared by the Department. That evaluation concludes that the exchange will not significantly restrict subsistence uses. NANA's potential development activities will be subject to strict environmental safeguards and restrictions, developed by NANA, in consultation with appropriate State and Federal agencies; significant displacement of fish and wildlife is, therefore, not expected to occur, and any relocation of resources utilized for subsistence purposes will not result in those resources becoming unavailable to the nearby residents. No significant restriction of subsistence uses is foreseen. NANA has provided stringent protections as part of the agreement.

In addition, formal consultation was undertaken with the Alaska Regional Office of the Fish and Wildlife Service and a biological opinion was provided concerning endangered species. The opinion concluded that the Arctic peregrine falcon is the only endangered species in the area of the proposed exchange, and that the exchange is not considered to jeopardize any falcons.

Also, in order to assure that the exchange and the activities resulting from the exchange will not adversely affect properties on or eligible for inclusion on the National Register of Historic Places, consultation was initiated with the Alaska State Historic Preservation Officer and the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation. Since the United States acquires lands of significant acreage with cultural resource values, and as a result of the significant restrictions on NANA's development activities, including provisions designed to prevent damage to cultural sites, both the State officer and the advisory council concluded that the exchange would have no adverse effect.

On the Federal level, the intergovernmental review of Federal programs was combined with the review of the proposed exchange by the State of Alaska pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act. The State was advised of the exchange and although the State did not agree that the exchange was consistent to the greatest extent practicable, it indicated that, if certain additional provisions were included in the exchange, it would be consistent with the State program. All but one or two of the suggested changes were agreed to by NANA and the Department and included in the agreement.

The National Park Service, as a matter of sound administrative practice and in order to understand fully the environmental impacts associated with this exchange, prepared a resource evaluation which is the functional equivalent of an environmental impact statement. That evaluation demonstrates that any environmental impacts associated with the land exchange can be mitigated to an acceptable degree and that the essential integrity of the monument's resources and values will not be undermined by the exchange, and instead that resource protection and management will be enhanced in several respects.

NANA and the Department formally advised the Alaska Land Use Council of the proposed exchange and it was given an opportunity to comment. A resolution of the council's land use advisers committee supported the exchange, and the council unanimously approved a resolution supporting the exchange.

Notice of the proposal also was published in the Federal Register advising the public of the availability of draft materials regarding the exchange, of a public meeting to be held on the subject May 1, 1984, at Anchorage, AK, and the opportunity for public comment at the meeting or in writing. Public comment was heard, received, and considered by the parties. In addition, NANA conducted village meetings throughout the region accompanied by National Park Service personnel to explain the land exchange.

Mr. Speaker, this proposed exchange is in NANA's best interests, the best interests of the Krusenstern Monument, and the best interests of the United States.●

REDUCED POSTAGE ON PACKAGES TO SOVIET UNION AND POLAND

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by my distinguished colleague, Mrs. KENNELLY, in reintroducing a bill to cut the price of postage in half on parcels of food, clothing, and medicine sent from the United States to the Soviet Union and Poland.

This legislation seeks to encourage much needed personal assistance from Americans to persons in Poland and the Soviet Union. We have a responsibility to do whatever is possible to make life a little easier for those repressed people who are forced to live under Soviet tyranny. We cannot ignore the fact that Poles and Soviet Jews are not only routinely deprived of basic human rights, but also of basic human needs, such as food, clothing, and medicine.

Under this bill the reduced postage rates would be in effect for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 and would apply to any parcel of food, medicine, or clothing, which is addressed to a destination in Poland or the Soviet Union.

It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that many Soviet Jews who apply to emigrate are often dismissed from their jobs and must rely on others for basic consumer goods. Reports from Poland indicate widespread malnutrition in Poland, with some 11 million Poles living at or below the subsistence level. Subsistence packages from the United States, then, serve as a vital lifeline to many in the Soviet Union and Poland.

According to the U.S. Postal Service, 167,480 parcels were sent from the United States to the Soviet Union in fiscal year 1984, with another 127,371 parcels going to Poland during that same period of time. The average weight of those parcels was 2.2 pounds. It costs approximately $22.50 to sent a 2.2-pound package by air mail from the United States to the Soviet Union, and $15.90 to send the same package to Poland. Under my proposal, those costs would be cut in half.

Mr. Speaker, reports from the Soviet Union and Poland indicate that the mail and packages the repressed people of those nations receive from abroad serve as their only source of hope. That hope must be allowed to continue and the bill I am introducing today would help to make that possible. I strongly urge that it be given prompt and favorable consideration.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert the text of the bill:

H.R. 1019

A bill to authorize reduced postal rates during fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for parcels of food, medicine, or clothing sent to Poland or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) effective during fiscal years 1986 and 1987, a parcel of food, medicine, or clothing, which is addressed to a destination in Poland or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and which otherwise satisfies applicable postal requirements (whether established by statute, treaty, or regulation), may be mailed at a rate of postage equal to one-half of the rate which would otherwise apply if the provisions of this Act had not been enacted.

(b) The Postal Service shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out subsection (a).

SEC. 2. Effective with respect to fiscal years 1986 and 1987, a reference in section 2401(c) or 3627 of title 39, United States Code, to section 3626 of such title (relating to reduced rates of postage) shall be deemed also to be a reference to the provisions of subsection (a) of the first section of this Act.●

IN SUPPORT OF THE MADE IN AMERICA ACT

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, today I join a number of my colleagues in introducing the Made in America Act, legislation which is designed to restore a measure of competitive equity in the U.S. marketplace, thereby preventing or remedying the serious injury to the U.S. economy now occurring from foreign automobile imports.

Our domestic automobile industry is the backbone of this Nation's transportation system, one of our first lines of defense, and one of the largest employers in our Nation. More than 20 percent of the steel made in the United States, 12 percent of the primary aluminum, half of the malleable iron, and 60 percent of the synthetic rubber are used in automobile production. More than 50,000 businesses spread throughout every congressional district in the United States are directly based upon automobile production.

But as I stand before the House today, Mr. Speaker, the domestic automobile industry—so vital to the economic health of our Nation—is under assault from foreign nations who shield their own industries from the rigors of open competition while taking refuge in our Government's inaction. And they have seized upon this inaction as a means of capturing a lion's share of our Nation's domestic automobile market.

The increasing foreign share of our domestic automobile market has produced severe effects on our Nation's overall economy. This year's Federal budget deficit is projected to exceed $225 billion, and we are straining under a trade deficit that may well exceed $130 billion.

Two large contributors to our massive trade deficits have been our deficits with Japan, in general, and our automobile trade deficits, in particular. Since 1981, the U.S. auto trade deficit has more than doubled—from $11 billion to $27 billion. The chief beneficiary of this has been Japanese automakers. The $19 billion automobile trade deficit with Japan alone accounts for more than half of our overall $34 billion trade deficit with Japan.

Japan employs a complex set of nontariff barriers to exclude American-built automobiles from sale in its country while it enjoys the fruits of an open U.S. automobile market. The combined effect of Japan's barriers and our open markets resulted in Japan exporting more than 1.9 million cars into the United States last year while we exported less than 4,000 of our autos to Japan. The United States cannot continue to unilaterally open our markets to unlimited Japanese auto imports while Japan keeps its door shut to our exports.

While the health of the American auto industry has improved over the past year, there are far fewer production workers employed today than in 1978. Today, more than 62,000 autoworkers remain on indefinite layoff and many once thriving production facilities are closed forever.

There is no reason why the United States should permit the Japanese to have billions of dollars in additional market access while the American people should be made to pay for a $225 billion Federal deficit, a $130 billion trade deficit, and swelling unemployment rolls. Without reasonable import limitations, the current recovery of the domestic automobile industry and its suppliers will be seriously jeopardized.

The Made in America Act is a reasonable measure which addresses this most serious economic problem. It makes a finding that imported motor vehicles, other than motorcycles, are being sold in the United States in such quantities as to cause or threaten to cause injury to the domestic auto industry and its workers and specifies that its purpose is to prevent or remedy the injury consistent with article XIX of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs [GATT]. The Secretary of Commerce will administer the provisions of the bill and will annually determine how many foreign and domestic vehicles were sold in the United States and establish a limit on imports of not more than 15 percent. The Secretary will then allocate this percentage among foreign vehicle manufacturers on the basis of their respective shares for imported vehicles during the prior year.

The legislation defines "foreign manufacturers" as those who imported at least 100,000 new motor vehicles in the prior year. The bill includes civil penalties of up to $2,000 per vehicle for violations. It is intended that implementation of the bill would not affect current trade agreements with Canada concerning autos. Import restrictions would terminate after 1990 if the injury to the United States has been remedied.

In essence, the problem is one of equity. Japan, through a series of barriers and restrictions, closes its doors to a wide variety of U.S. products, including automobiles, while the United States keeps its doors open to billions of dollars of imports. There is no reason why the United States should allow our international trading partners to have billions of dollars in market access while the American people are made to pay. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. It is time for a degree of equity to be added to our Nation's trade policies.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE MEDICAL IMPOSTORS ACT OF 1985

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing, for myself and Mr. PEPPER, the Medical Impostors Act of 1985. The purpose of this bill is twofold:

One, to provide penalties for bogus doctors who file for Medicare or Medicaid reimbursement for physicians' services.

Two, to provide penalties for doctors who claim falsely to be certified in a medical specialty and then seek Medicare or Medicaid reimbursement.

It's amazing that while the Medicare Program provides strict penalties for people who file for Medicare benefits under false pretenses, the program does not penalize phony doctors who get Medicare payment for physicians' services.

During a recent hearing before the Subcommittee on Health and Long Term Care of the Aging Committee, chaired by my distinguished colleague and cosponsor of this legislation, CLAUDE PEPPER, we found that in some instances the credentials framed on a doctor's wall may not be worth the paper they're printed on.

Impostors without a shred of medical training are performing medical operations on our citizens. My guess is, some of these phonies can't even spell "anesthetic," let alone administer one correctly.

Many of these people purchased phony degrees; some of them never even attended medical school; some of them attended foreign medical schools that have no pretense of quality.

What's particularly grotesque about all this is that at a time when critically needed Government health care programs are being reduced, the Federal Government is spending precious tax dollars to support consumer fraud. Through Medicare reimbursement, student loans, and in other ways, charlatans are systematically fleecing the Federal Government.

Our taxpayers are spending more than $70 billion every year on Medicare, and some of these dollars are going to phonies. A phony doctor can perform physician's services on a senior citizen, file for Medicare reimbursement, and suffer no consequences under the Medicare statutes. This important change evens the score—it will make fraudulent doctors liable in the same way that fraudulent beneficiaries are.

The need for this legislation was made clear during the important hearing convened under Chairman PEPPER's leadership. The Federal Government needs every tool available to root out fraud and waste in the Medicare system. That's why we need this legislation.

Beyond the issue of budgets and tax dollars is the issue of quality. The health care system in general, and the Medicare program in specific, are going through very substantial changes. To ensure quality in our health care services, we must take steps to protect senior citizens from frauds and charlatans.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to move forward with this legislation and take a concrete step toward putting medical impostors out of business.●

CAPITAL GAINS

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues an op-ed piece by Mr. Mark Bloomfield, executive director of the American Council for Capital Formation. The article concerns the benefits derived from the preferential treatment of capital gains for taxation purposes, and was printed in the Los Angeles Times on Sunday, June 17, 1984.

Although not recent, the article deserves consideration now as this Congress embarks upon the arduous tasks of deficit reduction and tax reform. Investment, and particularly venture capital, is critical to our continued competitiveness, economic growth and prosperity. Therefore, it has been my firm and long held belief that Congress should assist, not hinder capital investment in this country.

As pointed out in the article, the preferential treatment afforded to capital gains in our Tax Code has been instrumental in capital formation. Any plan that would eliminate or gut this preferential treatment runs the great risk of harming capital investment and the long term prosperity of the United States as well.

I hope my colleagues will seriously consider the merits, raised in the article, of preferentially treating capital gains.

CAPITAL GAINS

(By Mark Bloomfield)

As Congress and the Reagan Administration grapple this year with large and tenacious federal deficits, ideas for tax increases will certainly be considered, including, perhaps, suggestions to increase taxes on capital gains.

Before taking this step, critics of lower capital-gains taxes would do well to look at the 1978 capital-gains tax-cut experiment. That year, the maximum tax on capital gains was cut from 49% for individuals and about 31% for corporations to 28% for both.

Skeptics said reducing capital-gains taxes would do little for capital formation but would significantly erode government revenues. On both counts they have been proved dead wrong. First, look at the economics. There are two periods to compare—1969 to 1977, with high capital-gains taxes and, hence, a poor investment climate, and 1978 to the present, with lower capital-gains taxes and an improved investment climate.

What happened? In the most recent period, venture capital, new stock offerings and the value of corporate equities all took off. For example, the new capital committed to organized venture capital investment entities expanded from $58 million per year in the 1970–77 period to an average of almost $1.5 billion per year in 1978–83, with $4.1 billion in 1983 alone. The total pool of capital committed to organized venture-capital investors, which had remained static at $2.5 billion to $3 billion from 1969 to 1977, exploded to $11.5 billion at the end of 1983. Why? We had restored the reward for risk-taking and investment.

Second, look at Uncle Sam's treasury. The government in 1978 predicted that there would be an annual $2 billion raid on the U.S. Treasury if the proposed capital-gains tax cut became law. But, after 1978, capital-gains tax rates went down and revenues went up. Actual taxes paid on capital gains increased by more than $2 billion in 1979, the first year of the lower capital-gains tax rate. They rose again in 1980. In 1981, the actual revenues paid on capital gains were substantially higher than those in 1978, the last year under the old law.

Economists, however, also compare actual capital-gains tax receipts with what would have happened if tax laws had not been changed. In a January, 1983, paper commissioned by the American Council for Capital Formation's Center for Policy Research, Gerald Auten, a Treasury Department tax policy consultant, compared taxes actually paid under the new law with taxes that would have been paid under the old law.

What did he find? In 1979, Treasury revenues were about $1 billion greater; in 1980, $1.6 billion higher, and in 1981, $1.4 billion more than they would have been under the older, higher rates.

Incidentally, the evidence so far also indicates that so-called fat cats are paying more capital-gains taxes than ever before. Those with incomes greater than $100,000 included $11.7 billion of net capital gains in adjusted gross income in 1979, an increase of 72% over the $6.8 billion reported in 1978. The net gain included in income rose to $12.7 billion in 1980 for this group.

The 1978 capital-gains tax cut was a success for capital formation and the U.S. Treasury. But have we gone as far as we can to ensure the maximum benefit to the American economy from lower capital-gains taxes? In my judgement, no.

Even after the latest U.S. capital-gains tax cut in 1981, we still tax capital gains more harshly than do most other major industrialized countries. Australia, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Japan and the Netherlands do not tax long-term capital gains on portfolio stock investments at all, and France taxes those investments at a maximum rate of 15% and Canada at 17%. The U.S. maximum rate of 20% on individuals is exceeded only by Sweden and the United Kingdom.

Yes, U.S. effective capital-gains tax rates should be reduced. First, the capital-gains tax limits the availability of new investment funds, results in the "lock-in" of existing capital and, thereby, interferes with the free flow of economic resources.

Second, taxation of capital gains inhibits the willingness of entrepreneurs and investors to develop and participate in high-risk ventures.

Third, the pernicious effect of inflation on capital gains creates a serious barrier to saving and investment. For example, Auten's analysis shows that the $25 billion in capital gains from stock sold in the period 1971-75 actually represented a loss of $420 million after adjusting for inflation.

Moreover, current high U.S. capital-gains taxes levied on individuals and corporations have important consequences for economic growth by holding down the level of stock equity prices and, ultimately, job creation. Sound tax policy dictates the eventual elimination of the capital-gains tax for individuals and corporations.

To move in that direction in a practical fashion, a balanced package of capital-gains tax reductions should be at the top of any tax-reform agenda. It should include further cuts in the capital-gains tax rates for individuals and businesses, reduction in the corporate capital-gains tax rate of 28% to the 20% maximum for individuals, adjustment of capital gains for inflation and elimination or reduction of the holding period for long-term treatment of capital gains.●

U.S.-U.S.S.R. UNDERSTANDINGS ON CUBA

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an exchange of correspondence with the Department of State concerning the nature of understandings between the United States and the Soviet Union which ended the 1962 Cuban missile crisis, and the administration's views of those understandings.

The correspondence, including my letter to the State Department, dated October 1, 1984, and the State Department's reply, dated February 4, 1985, follows:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, October 1, 1984.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
Secretary, Department of State,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I write concerning the October, 1962 understandings between the United States and the Soviet Union which ended the Cuban missile crisis and the Administration's view of, and policies toward, those understandings.

Specifically, I would like to know: (1) Do you believe that there were understandings dating from that time regarding Soviet military presence in Cuba and U.S. policies toward Cuba; (2) If you do, what is the substance of those understandings; (3) Are those understandings, in your view, still in place or have they been abrogated by Cuban or Soviet policies; (4) What evidence is there that a violation of those understandings has occurred and, if you feel there is evidence, what happened and when and where did it happen; and (5) What Soviet submarine activity, in and around Cuba, do you feel is not a violation of the 1962 understanding and what such deployments are a violation?

I appreciate your early response to this letter.

With best regards,
Sincerely yours,
LEE H. HAMILTON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, February 4, 1985.

Hon. LEE H. HAMILTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing in response to your letter of October 1 concerning the US-USSR Understanding on Cuba. I apologize for the unusually lengthy delay in responding, and hope that the following information proves helpful.

I should first note that the Understanding is not a formal agreement, but rather a political understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union concerning Cuba. The Government of Cuba is not a party to the Understanding. The Understanding grew out of the 1962 Cuban missile crisis, and since that time, there have been additional diplomatic exchanges with the USSR. It is the sum of these exchanges and discussions which constitute the Understanding.

The essence of the Understanding is that the Soviet Union has undertaken not to reintroduce offensive weapons into Cuba. This was clarified in later exchanges to encompass a ban on the use of Cuba for the stationing or support of offensive weapons systems, such as nuclear submarines and submarines carrying offensive weapons.

In 1970, the United States was concerned about evident Soviet plans to service nuclear submarines in Cuba, and this concern led to the discussions and clarification noted above. We continue to minitor closely Soviet activities in Cuba. Should we detect anything which raises questions of compliance with the Understanding, we are prepared to take steps to deal with it.

We consider the Understanding to be a useful basis for holding the USSR accountable for its activities in Cuba. The United States has expressed its concern about Soviet and Cuban policies in the region, but it does not believe that they have abrogated the Understanding. We see no indication that the USSR considers it to be invalid.

I hope that this information answers the concerns which you raised in your letter.

Sincerely,
ROBERT TURNER,
Acting Assistant Secretary, Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.●

INTRODUCTION OF AUTOMOBILE STRATEGY AND STABILITY ACT OF 1985

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, as we all know, on March 31 the voluntary restraint agreement with the Japanese on auto imports will expire. We are as a result faced with a decision regarding whether or not to pressure the Japanese to extend these voluntary restraints for another year, or failing that, to unilaterally impose limits on auto imports from Japan.

Today I am introducing legislation which would extend restraints on Japanese auto imports into the United States at the current rate of 1.85 million units per year for the remainder of 1985. During this 9-month period, under the provisions of this bill, management and labor in the auto industry would sit down with Government and consumer representatives to formulate a long term strategy for the U.S. auto industry. This task force would make recommenditions about actions which must be taken by management and labor in the auto industry on the one hand, and the Government on the other hand, to have a competitive U.S. auto industry in the future.

The days of effortless superiority for the U.S. auto industry are over. Today, despite the impressions which might be left from the $10 billion in 1983 profits earned by U.S. auto firms, they are engaged in intense international competition. They are fighting for their very survival against high quality, productive, export oriented foreign auto industries and governments.

In the past decade, the share of the domestic U.S. auto market held by foreign firms has nearly doubled. The U.S. world market share in autos has fallen from 27 percent in 1975 to 19 percent in 1982.

By 1984, the United States experienced a trade deficit with the Japanese of over $35 billion. Of that deficit $20 billion was owing to automobile trade.

The United States has the largest automobile market in the world. Yet, increasingly, to compete in our domestic market, U.S. auto firms are being forced to move to foreign outsourcing of component parts for auto production. This is costing the United States high quality jobs and undermining the long term stability of our domestic auto industry. It is time we asked ourselves how we can reverse this disturbing trend.

The fact that today we have no competitive strategy for our auto sector is one of the main reasons we are losing market shares. If the United States is to have a competitive auto sector, automobiles management, labor, and government are going to have to work together to develop a private-public sector strategy for insuring future competitiveness. Auto management, labor and government must have a common vision of the future and mutual understanding about what each is willing to do to shore up U.S. competitiveness.

I believe there is still a lot of long term strength left in the U.S. auto industry. There is intense domestic competition in the auto industry and it is in the interest of the consumer to preserve this competition.

Each of the major U.S. auto producers is engaged in some exciting efforts which are important to international competitiveness. The $5 billion investment in the Saturn project recently announced by General Motors, if it succeeds, could mean the production over the long term of a competitive American small car. The decision to undertake this production on U.S. soil in a unionized environment is encouraging and a welcome sign of revitalization. The extraordinary turnaround of Chrysler since 1979 from a nearly bankrupt firm to a profitable one opens up many opportunities for continued productivity improvement and growth there. Ford had made tremendous strides forward in improving productivity and quality. Labor management cooperation has provided benefits ranging from investment in new manufacturing technology to more appropriate product design.

We would not want to undermine any of these efforts through abrupt removal of the voluntary restraint agreement with the Japanese. I think we certainly would be kidding ourselves if we believed that we could remove these restraints and not experience a significant influx of additional Japanese cars that might undermine the efforts ongoing at General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler and elsewhere to build for the future. Some experts estimate that if auto restraints are removed this year, the Japanese in short order would capture 40 percent of the U.S. domestic market.

The recent auto profits must not lead us into a false sense of security about the future. International auto competitiveness will require continued and extensive capital investment, human resource development, cooperation between labor and management, and coordination of Government economic and trade policies.

Today, U.S. auto firms are not on a level playing field with their Japanese counterparts. It is estimated that the Japanese have between a $1,500 and $2,000 advantage over American car producers. Primary reasons for this include the inflated value of the dollar against the yen on international exchange markets, and that the Japanese rebate too their domestic firms their commodity taxes on products they export. The competitive advantage enjoyed by the Japanese in autos will not be easiy eliminated.

It is entirely possible that the joint government, labor, management and consumer council called for in this legislation will end up recommending other trade and economic actions in an effort to create a more even trading environment. In that event, however, there will be an understanding of what the strategy is to facilitate removal of these restraints and to compete with the Japanese and others in the future.

I believe there are options to continued quotas on Japanese automobiles which can be explored over the next 9 months. In upcoming weeks, I will be making other proposals in the trade area which I believe should enable us to make constructive progress toward a more progressive trading climate for automobiles and other products as well.

It is not economically desirable nor attractive to continue to provide trade relief to the U.S. auto industry without a strategic view of the future—that is, unless we understand how trade and other actions are going to strengthen the competitiveness of the U.S. auto industry and economy. Business, labor, and Government must discard old adversarial relationships and realize that their actions must begin to compliment each other if we are going to compete successfully in the future.

It is important for the Government to understand what actions the private sector—both management and labor are taking during the period of these restraints which will make them more competitive when they are finally removed. Consumers also have a stake in the removal of the voluntary restraints and should be a partner in this cooperative working relationship.

The program called for in this bill can be the start of a new approach to economic problem solving and to the competitive dilemmas U.S. industries are encountering as they try to compete in international markets. The United States has maintained the most open market in the world during the last century and certainly will continue to strive to preserve open trade. The best way to do that is to meet the competitive challenge facing us, and the best way to do that is to foster more cooperative working relationships between management, labor, and Government.

The Japanese should understand the need for this proposal. In many important industrial sectors, including autos, they have protected their domestic market through various means to nurture the development of their industries. They should understand the economic imperative which creates serious concern in the United States over the future of our auto industry and our need to develop a strategic concept of industrial development. From their perspective, the alternative to this proposal at the present time could very well be the application of more restrictive measures on auto imports.

I commend this legislation to my colleagues in the Congress and to the Reagan administration as a blueprint for future action on auto trade and domestic auto policy.●

NEBRASKA SCORES ON WEST COAST VISIT

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an interesting article that appeared not long ago in the Omaha World Herald's Magazine of the Midlands. It was written by Col. Barney Oldfield, a former Nebraska newsman who now works as a consultant with Litton Industries. He frequently writes for the magazine.

Colonel Oldfield is an impressive gentleman. His life and work have carried him far from Nebraska, but his heart remains close to the people of our great State.

In this particular article, he writes about a venture to promote Nebraska through its prized football team. I commend the article to the attention of my colleagues:

NEBRASKA SCORES ON WEST COAST VISIT

(By Barney Oldfield)

LOS ANGELES.—Here, adjacent to Hollywood, home of that intrepid "$6 Million Man," Nebraska recently surfaced with a $100 million version.

The Hollywood model on TV several seasons ago was, of course, bionic, make-believe.

The Nebraska offering is all business, very real, and goes by the name of David Murdock.

His is short in stature, gray of hair, intense, driven to bring off whatever he is commited to do. He is long on money—Forbes magazine sets his net worth at more than $500 million, which places him about 46th among America's richest.

Murdock does not leap over tall buildings, but, instead, builds them and other things as well.

Of the 26 states in which he operates, he is most ecstatic about Nebraska. His actions prove it: More than $100 million of his resources and the matching investments that such funds attract are bet on Nebraska's present and future.

Murdock was encouraged by the Nebraska Diplomats, the Nebraska Industrial Development Association, and the Department of Economic Development, with Gov. Kerrey cheering him on, to come to California where the Murdock Development Corp. is based to express his sentiments before an audience of local movers and shakers.

It was one of Nebraska's most sophisticated outings. Forays had previously been made to Chicago and Minneapolis, homes of corporate headquarters, places where decisions are made about plant expansions. But California was different, and it was no coincidence.

This pilgrimage was built on the Nebraska football team's encounter in the Rose Bowl with the University of California at Los Angeles. It has long been known that the 10,000 to 16,000 supporters who follow the team are a short of floating economic infusion whenever they go out of town.

This time, the decision was made to capitalize on the news media's buildup before, during and after such a game.

And where better for this than California? Everything in California is supposed to be sunnier, prettier, bigger, grander, more exciting, and if any of that is proven untrue, there's somebody in the state rich enough to go after it and stake a claim to some of it.

The Nebraska delegation counted on that. Don Dowrak's Department of Economic Development sent Nebraska emissaries with sound business credentials to call on companies looking for places to go.

During the pre-game week, they knocked on more than 100 such doors, and they closed out the week by giving a luncheon for others who had not been previously tapped.

At the luncheon, Murdock said he likes to be engaged in projects that are "good for people." He said his work in Nebraska goes back 16 years, and he said he has come to know the state's citizens as "real people." In Nebraska, he said, "good business could be done with good friends."

Kerrey said people of Nebraska "never have to be taught how to work," that they understand "the joy of being successful."

Evidence other than Murdock's certification also was cited.

R.M. Martin, general manager for the Kellogg Co. plant in Omaha, said Kellogg originally located in Nebraska because of its central location.

"We stayed because there is such a cooperative work force," Martin said.

Laurin Morin, a manufacturing vice president for Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing (3M), said his firm was attracted by the levels of technical location, available power and accessible transportation.

"We stayed and expanded," he said, "because of Nebraska's work ethic and attitude."

The luncheon guests also heard of a study by the Alexander Grant & Co., a survey which listed Nebraska as the fourth most attractive business climate in the nation. Nebraska's ranking was arrived at by high scoring in productivity, reasonable electric utility costs, unemployment insurance rates, workmen's compensation, labor-management relations and educational systems—the shadow of the Nebraska football team was cast even there, considering how well it comes off in academic All-America candidates.

Other football analogies arose. The delegation offered interested businesses followups with "special teams" available to deal with expertise. The "linemen" in this instance were more verbal than physical, being able to address specific questions in detail.

Although it never appears in such statistics—but does in conversation—there seems something a bit uncanny about plant locations in Indiana (not too far from Notre Dame), in Ohio (in proximity to Ohio State), in Alabama, Florida, Texas.

It is so handy to have a Friday meeting which runs late, carries over to Saturday morning, and if the right teams are playing just up the road, well, why not? Some of the best intersectional clashes are witnessed by busy, profit-oriented executives winding down.

And what better specimen of the game is there than what happens in Lincoln? If the backhome team is not doing too well, a kind of dual citizenship can put one in the neighborhood of a winner.

At least a third of the attendees who were met and talked to by the Nebraska delegation were also in the Rose Bowl that September day.

Those who didn't go probably heard Gary Bender and Pat Haden telling CBS's viewers that Nebraska was different, that its program developed athletes, while most schools only recruited them.

The day after the game, the Los Angeles Times' headline on Page 1 of its sports section said: "Nebraska Deals UCLA a Dose of Cold Reality in 42-3 Debacle." On Page 3 was another story: "There's One Word for What Happened to UCLA: Execution."

The Los Angeles Herald-Examiner ran an eight-column headline, saying bluntly: "Cornhuskers Hit Bruins Where They Live." None could fault that as a final parenthesis on a week of Nebraska consciousness level-raising.

Sure, many Californians are almost mulish about believing that anything east of California is only something to be flown over on one's way to New York or Washington.

But most Nebraskans recall the story about how to break a mule: First, slam him between the eyes with a two-by-four to get his attention.

Gov. Kerrey, David Murdock, the Nebraska Diplomats, the Nebraska Industrial Development Association, the State Department of Economic Development—plus the news media saturation campaign about the menace of a top-notch Nebraska football team on the sports pages and TV programs—left Southern California with no doubts about whether they had gained the attention.●

JOBS PROJECT SUCCEEDS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, the President has stressed that we must begin to break the cycle of dependency on the Federal Government and create opportunities for disadvantaged persons to set up on their own.

I am pleased to inform the House that such a program is working in Aroostook County, ME. This project is Aroostook Cooperative TOPS—Training Opportunities for the Private Sector—and it has enabled 24 individuals to find jobs and get themselves off the welfare rolls. In the program, Federal funds that would normally go toward welfare payments are used by the State to fund on-the-job training programs.

It is of particular importance to note that this program largely served single mothers with dependent children. These mothers face overwhelming difficulties in establishing their economic independency, and the Federal Government has been grappling with their plight with only limited success. I am encouraged by the TOPS program, and would like to extend my congratulations to those who have made it a success.

I ask that the text of a Bangor Daily Sun article describing this program appear after my remarks.

[From the Bangor (Maine) Daily Sun, Jan. 23, 1985]

TOPS EMPLOYMENT PROJECT CALLED A SUCCESS

(By Debra Sund)

PRESQUE ISLE.— The first year of an employment and training project to get welfare recipients working and off government aid has been a "huge success in Aroostook County," according to a project coordinator.

Robert Glidden, regional manager for the Division of Welfare Employment in Presque Isle, said Monday that 24 individuals were able to find jobs and get off welfare as a result of the project.

Of the 24 people now working, Glidden said that 20 could have been unable to find jobs without participating in the program.

The project was titled "Aroostook Cooperative TOPS." TOPS stands for Training Opportunities in the Private Sector, individuals participating in the project were mostly single mothers with dependent children.

Although it is similar to other work-incentive programs, the TOPS project incorporated the grand-division concept. Under that idea, federal funds that would be going to the welfare recipient would be used by the state in funding on-the-job training programs for those involved in the project.

The TOPS program was the third phase of the state Welfare and Employment Training Program, which began in 1981 and is administered by the Maine Department of Human Services.

A total of $400,000 from the Ford Foundation was granted to the Maine Department of Human Services to study whether the TOPS mehtod was an effective method to help welfare recipients become financially independent of the welfare program. Part of New Jersey and the city of San Diego also received grants to study the system's effectiveness, Gidden said.

Maine was the only state to conduct the study on a statewide basis, according to Glidden.

The first two phases of TOPS, prevocational training and field placement, were administered by the Welfare Employment and Training Program. The third phase, which is on-the-job training, was operated by the Aroostook County Action Program's employment and training division.

Both agencies credit the success of the program partly to the cooperative attitude between the participating organizations. Other cooperating agencies were adult education programs and other public groups.

"One thing that was shown was the cooperation among the agencies," said Glidden. "If all of these agencies cooperate and work together, some real major effect can result."

The ACAP director of operations for employment and training, Michael St. John, said that more programs should encourage cooperation between agencies that offer similar assistance.

"I thought it was a positive program," said St. John.

St. John also said that if continued, clients should be screened more closely. Individuals with no work experience should not participate in the TOPS program, St. John suggested.

Glidden said that the Aroostook County project's success also was a result of the small network of social service agencies in Northern Maine.

"We're out here at the end of a rope," St. John said. "Aroostook County is at the end of the line," which can result in a lot of cooperation.

During the year-long experiment, five classes were held in Aroostook County. A total of 111 people participated, with 72 in the TOPS program and 39 in a control group. The control participants received no additional vocation assistance that was usually rendered.

From those in the TOPS program, 11 people found employment without on-the-job training. A total of 13 found work under the on-the-job training phase.

The average entry-level wage of those entering on-the-job training was $3.75 an hour, and those entering employment directly without the training received $3.90, Glidden said.

Clients entering pre-vocational training were reimbursed for expenses during the program, such as child care or transportation. The average social service costs for each client entering pre-vocational training was $630.63, Glidden said.

A class for pre-vocational training has started in Caribou, and the TOPS concept will continue to be utilized during this year, Glidden said.●

A REAL PROGRAM FOR HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the administration's budget proposals, which suggest a wholesale retreat from the longstanding Federal commitment to improving our Nation's housing supply and revitalizing our urban areas, I think it would be useful for us to listen to what the people who work in those areas at the local level have to say.

According, I am submitting for the RECORD a synopsis of the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment official's task force report on the future of the public role in housing and urban development.

BETTER PLACES TO LIVE

(By Jane Lang McGrew, Task Force Chairperson)

The Report of the NAHRO Task Force on the Future of the Public Role in Housing and Urban Development is a statement of confidence in the capacity of government to achieve our national objectives of a decent home and suitable living environment for all Americans.

Contrary to the myth of public failure, government can take credit for many good and lasting accomplishments in housing and urban development. Profiting from the lessons learned from both its mistakes and successes, government can play an exciting and productive role in housing our people and revitalizing our cities. The question is not how to shrink the public role, but how to maximize its potential for success.

The commitment of govenment is needed at all levels to do the job. At the federal level, the task force has called for a national urban agenda that sets policy objectives and establishes a framework for allocating public resources. The agenda must include, first, a comprehensive housing policy, with a view to assuring an adequate supply of decent housing for low- and moderate-income people. It also must include a fair housing strategy, with the goal of eradicating housing discrimination and promoting integration. And it must embrace an urban development policy that is premised on a continuing federal investment role in the cities.

The task force believes that the federal government must stay involved in housing and community development. This involvement, however, doesn't diminish the responsibilities of the states and the cities. The states must be active partners with the federal and local governments, and the cities must be their own advocates. They must take the initiative to direct development to achieve locally determined objectives.

The task force has stressed the importance of local planning and public-private partnerships. Such partnerships should include not only business, but also neighborhoods, the basic building blocks of urban society. It also urged closer working relationships between units of general local government and redevelopment agencies and housing authorities. Working with these agencies and drawing on their experience and expertise, local government can realize the capacity of the public sector to be a creative investor, strategist, and entrepreneur in housing and development.

The task force report is focused on the physical development of our cities. But it states emphatically that the success of development efforts depends on sucessfully solving the human problems that abound in our cities. Millions live in this country in urban poverty. National acquiescence in this fact is intolerable. The public sector can and must play the major role in awakening this country to its urban responsibilities and opportunities. For this, our cities need the best and the brightest public leaders America has to offer.

RECOMMENDATIONS

(1) The task force recommends that Congress adopt a national urban agenda incorporating a comprehensive housing policy, a fair housing strategy, and a comprehensive urban development policy.

The national urban agenda requires an explicit statement of presidential commitment to carry out its objectives through regulatory, legislative, fiscal, and procurement policies. The country should hear the President say, over and over: attention must be paid to our cities and the housing needs of all our people.

The national urban agenda should call for a biannual independent report to the nation on progress in housing and urban development, followed by response from the federal government. The independence of the report, prepared by a group such as the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, is critical if it is to provide an objective measure of achievements, rather than a political scorecard for an incumbent administration.

(2) The task force recommends the development of a comprehensive housing policy that allocates federal resources and tailors federal programs to assure that decent housing is available to all Americans.

Congress should comprehensively catalogue and monitor the costs of current housing policy, including both outlays and tax expenditures, and trace their direct and indirect benefits to taxpayers by income levels.

Congress should reallocate federal expenditures for housing to adequately fund existing low-income housing production and rehabilitation programs.

Specifically, Congress should fund approximately 350,000 new or substantially rehabilitated low-income units each year. It also should appropriate on a continuing basis sufficient money to modernize public housing and to repair low-income units needing moderate rehabilitation.

Congress should establish and fund a shelter allowance program for all families receiving public assistance.

Congress should set home owner tax deductions at a level and in a manner that encourages home ownership for lower-, moderate-, and middle-income persons without subsidizing luxury or overconsumption of housing.

Congress should design more efficient tax incentives that maintain the relative advantage of investing in the construction and rehabilitation of low-income rental housing.

Congress should retain mortgage revenue bonds as a mainstay of an affordable housing policy, targeting their benefits to first time home buyers and lower-income earners.

(3) The task force recommends a federal strategy of vigorous fair housing enforcement.

The President should direct HUD and the Department of Justice to enforce the law against housing discrimination aggressively.

The President should support and Congress should enact amendments to the Fair Housing Act that provide an administrative enforcement mechanism and stiff penlties for violations.

The President should direct HUD to promote opportunities for racial integration by consciously administering federal housing and community development programs with this goal in mind.

(4) The task force recommends that the federal government make a long-term commitment to invest in urban development and infrastructure in the context of a comprehensive development policy to complement local efforts to build and maintain viable communities.

As a condition of receiving CDBG funds, localities should be required to demonstrate the relationship between program expenditures and the achievement of their long-term development goals.

The expenditure of CDBG funds should be substantially restricted to eradicating blight in developed areas and preventing blight in growth areas.

As a condition for receiving CDBG funds, localities should be required to concentrate federal resources, in conjunction with local and private resources, on the revitalization of target areas within a reasonable time period.

Cities and states should be given incentives to encourage the maximum return on and reinvestment of CDBG funds in eligible development activities.

Congress should marshal existing and additional program authorities to establish and fund a targeted, long-term program to restore slum areas to vital components of our urban communities.

The federal government should participate in developing bond banks to enable states and cities to meet infrastructure needs more cheaply, efficiently, and safely.

Congress should mandate a national infrastructure inventory that details capital, maintenance, and rehabilitation needs, including a statement of purpose, justification, and priority with respect to each expenditure.

The standards and constraints set on federal infrastructure aid programs should be reexamined to provide maximum local flexibility, promote efficiency, and take advantage of technological advances.

A strong HUD should be encouraged by the President to take a leadership role to assure that the federal commitment to urban development is met.

(5) The task force recommends that local government initiate or recommit itself to an ongoing and comprehensive planning process.

The local planning process should seek to coordinate and reconcile the broad range of programs, policies, and goals within the public sector that affect the economic and physical health of the city, as well as the quality of life.

Public, business, neighborhood, and nonprofit sector representatives should be engaged on a continuing basis in jointly setting goals for community building and devising strategies for achieving them.

The opportunity for change should be built into the planning process through mechanisms for periodic review and assessment.

(6) The task force recommends that local government collaborate with private business, neighborhoods, and nonprofit citizens' groups to achieve community development goals.

Local government should define and promote public development objectives to the maximum extent feasible.

Local government should draw on the powers, know-how, and experience of redevelopment agencies to maximize the effectiveness of the public role in development.

Local government should identify and understand the value of the range of traditional public resources and powers that it has to offer a private partner.

Local government should experiment with novel entrepreneurial techniques and vehicles to retain ongoing participation in development projects.

Local government should assure that neighborhood interests are factored into public entrepreneurial undertakings.

Local government should stimulate and recognize long-term civic involvement and cooperation among private business leaders.

Local government should reach out to existing neighborhood groups, voluntary associations, cooperatives, block clubs, and religious institutions to discover ways to support their neighborhood projects.

Local housing and redevelopment programs should be designed to build on and enhance the capabilities of neighborhood groups.

Neighborhood groups should be engaged with the public and business sectors in long-term planning for housing and development.

(7) The task force recommends that local government recognize its responsibility for assuring the availability of decent housing for all in the community and commit itself to meeting this responsibility to the fullest extent of its powers and resources.

Local plans for development and community revitalization should incorporate the community's housing needs and the objective of satisfying them.

Local government should reexamine the role of the local housing authority to maximize its potential to meet the shelter needs of low- and moderate-income persons through non-traditional means in cooperaton with other public agencies and the private sector.

Public, business, neighborhood, and civic leaders should be involved in defining and carrying out the future role of the housing authority and other public agencies in ways that most effectively serve local housing needs.

Local government and its housing authority should promote a positive image of assisted housing by publicizing public housing success stories and dramatizing the need for this resource. Cities should make this a long-term, coordinated effort to deliver the message nationwide that government has learned how to build and manage low-income housing to enhance a community and serve a common public interest.●

THE SOLE SOURCE AQUIFER PROGRAM

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today that will go far to protect the drinking water of millions of Americans who rely on sole source aquifers for their water supplies. I am joined by my friends and colleagues TOM FOLEY, HENRY WAXMAN, BOB MRAZEK, LARRY SMITH, JAKE PICKLE, JIM FLORIO, and AL SWIFT, who recognize the urgent need to preserve these unique underground water systems.

Congress created the Sole Source Aquifer Program in the late 1970's to address Federal Government activities in areas in which drinking water is drawn from only one aquifer or underground reservoir. I believe that a broader Federal approach to sole source aquifer protection must be taken today. There are now 17 sole source aquifers across the country in States ranging from New York to Washington to California to Texas to Florida. Incidents of contamination in these water systems are growing and the threat of impure drinking water is becoming increasingly imminent for millions of people.

Maintaining an abundance of high quality water in an aquifer depends on the nature and use of the land above the acquifer's recharge zone and the quality of the inflowing water. A recharge zone is an area through which precipitation and other surface runoff filters down into the water table. Once contaminated, there is no practical means to cleanse an aquifer. Recent facts point to the problems around the country.

In many sole source areas, ground water contamination has resulted from a long period of dense development on the land directly above the aquifer. On the east end of Long Island, 1,500 private wells have been contaminated by pesticides that have entered the aquifer system. In Washington State, nearly 13 percent of Spokane's public wells have been closed in the last 6 years because of serious contamination of the Spokane-Rathdrum Valley aquifer. The benefits of commerical, residential and agricultural development are obvious; the drawbacks are not often noticed until it is too late. The list of possible sources of ground water contamination is long and varied. Landfills and leaking underground storage tanks are recognized as some of the most pervasive sources of contamination. Fertilizers, pesticides, and liquid waste from septic tanks can leach into an aquifer. Runoff from roads brings animal wastes, road salts, and petroleum products into an aquifer system. Less obvious but just as dangerous are household products such as drain cleaners, solvents, disinfectants, and paint removers.

Congress has long recognized the need to protect surface waters. The river systems of the West have been extensively dammed to prevent flooding, provide hydroelectric power and store water for drinking and irrigation. Billions of dollars have been spent on wastewater treatment plants to reduce the flow of untreated sewage into our waters. Time is running out, however, for preservation of ground water systems such as sole source aquifers. Severe contamination of a sole source system would mean either the local ground water would have to be treated or potable water would have to be transported into the area from distant sources. The cost of applying these Band-Aid type solutions is prohibitive. Preventing the problems before they develop is sound public policy that will mean cost savings and clean drinking water for millions of people.

Our legislation will go far to achieve these goals by addressing the vital link between the use of the land above a sole source aquifer and the quality of the water in the system. The legislation sets up no new or complicated regulatory structure. It preserves local autonomy while providing a framework for Federal, State, and local governments to work together cooperatively to plan and implement comprehensive plans to safeguard sole source aquifers. Additionally, Federal authority is provided to States and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to take remedial action when a sole source system becomes contaminated. The legislation will enable a State or the Environmental Protection Agency Administrator to order any person responsible for the contamination of a sole source aquifer to provide adequate supplies of potable water to the persons served by that aquifer system.

Last year, Congressman FOLEY, Congressman WAXMAN and I worked hard to see that our legislation passed through this body. Regrettably, our legislative vehicle, the Safe Drinking Water Act reauthorization, did not become law. This year, I am hopeful that our new found support will propel our initiative into law. When this added protection becomes a reality, millions of Americans will have Congress to thank for their safe supply of drinking water.

H.R. 1038

A bill to amend the Safe Drinking Water Act to provide for the protection of aquifers which are the sole or principal source of drinking water for public water systems

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Safe Drinking Water Act Sole Source Aquifer Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. PROTECTION OF CRITICAL RECHARGE AREAS.

(a) NEW SECTION 1426.—Part C of title XIV of the Public Health Service Act (the "Safe Drinking Water Act") is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 1426. PROTECTION OF CRITICAL GROUND WATER RECHARGE AREAS.

"(a) LOCAL PETITION FOR DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL PROTECTION AREA.—(1) Upon designation of a sole or principal source area pursuant to section 1424(e), any one or several municipalities within such area may initiate proceedings for the designation of one or more special protection areas within such sole or principal source area. Such proceedings shall be initiated by petitioning the Governor of the State in which the area is located to apply to the Administrator for such designation.

"(2) A petition under this subsection shall contain suggested boundaries for the special protection area and further shall evaluate whether—

"(A) the proposed special protection area is a recharge zone for significant volumes of ground water with drinking water supply potential;

"(B) the ground water which is recharged through the proposed special protection area is of high quality;

"(C) portions within the sole or principal source area are already contaminated with toxic organics, nutrients, salts, or other pollutants;

"(D) maintenance of high quality in the ground water recharged through the proposed special protection area would have significant economic, social, and ecological benefits for the sole or principal source area; and

"(E) degradation of ground water recharged through the proposed special protection area would have significant economic, social, and ecological costs for the area.

"(b) ACTION BY GOVERNOR.—Within 180 days following receipt of a petition under this section, the Governor, taking into consideration the criteria set forth in of subsection (a)(2), shall approve or disapprove the petition. If the Governor approves such petition, he shall—

"(1) propose the boundries of the special protection area;

"(2) designate or, if necessary, establish a planning entity (which shall be a public agency including local and State governmental representation) to develop a comprehensive management plan (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'plan') for the special protection area;

"(3) establish procedures for public participation in the development of the plan, for review, approval, and adoption of the plan, and for assistance to municipalities and other public agencies with authority under State law to implement the plan.

Where a local government planning agency exists with adequate expertise to carry out this section with respect to any proposed special protection area, the Governor shall designate such agency as the planning entity under paragraph (2).

"(c) ACTION BY EPA.—(1) Following approval of the petition the Governor shall submit such petition to the Administrator together with the summary of the action taken by the Governor under subsection (b).

"(2) Within 120 days after the Administrator's receipt of the petition of the Administrator shall approve or disapprove the petition. The Administrator shall approve the petition if he finds that—

"(A) the boundaries of the area concerned are based on the criteria set forth in subsection (a)(2); and

"(B) the planning entity has the authority, pursuant to State law, and the technical expertise to prepare the plan.

"(3) If the Administrator approves the petition, he may provide to the State, on a matching basis, a grant of 50 per centum of the costs incurred in preparing the petition and developing the plan. In the case of an aquifer which serves a population of 50,000 or less, the Administrator may provide to the State, on a matching basis, a grant of 70 percent of such costs.

"(4) The designated planning entity, through the Governor, shall be eligible for such planning funds for a period not to exceed two years.

"(d) COMPREHENSIVE MANAGEMENT PLAN.—(1) A planning entity designated under this section shall be authorized and directed to prepare a comprehensive management plan for the special protection area. Such plan shall be designed to maintain the quality of the ground water recharged in the special protection area through maintenance, to the maximum extent possible, of the natural vegetative and hydrogeological conditions. Such plan shall include but not be limited to—

"(A) a determination of the quality of the existing ground water recharged in said special protection area and the natural recharge capabilities of the special protection area watershed;

"(B) an identification of existing and potential point and nonpoint sources of ground water degradation, ground water flow patterns, and the relationship between surface water management and ground water quality and recharge;

"(C) recommendations for ground water quality standards designed to maintain existing ground water quality or improve existing ground water quality if prevailing conditions fail to meet drinking water standards, pursuant to this Act and State law;

"(D) a map showing the detailed boundary of the special protection area;

"(E) a resource assessment of the amount, location, and type of human development and activity which the ecosystem can sustain while still maintaining existing ground and surface water quality and protecting unique ecological features related to maintenance of water quality;

"(F) proposal of limits on Federal, State, and local government, financially assisted activities and projects which may contribute to any degradation of such ground water or any loss of natural surface and subsurface infiltration or purification capability of the special protection area watershed;

"(G) development of a comprehensive statement of land use management, including emergency contingency planning, as it pertains to the maintenance of the quality of underground sources of drinking water or to the improvement of such sources if necessary to meet drinking water standards pursuant to this Act and State law;

"(H) proposal of limits on land uses in the special protection area which might have an adverse impact on water quality, recharge capabilities, or both;

"(I) consideration and proposal of specific techniques, including, but not limited to clustering, transfer of development rights, and other innovative measures sufficient to achieve the objectives of this section;

"(J) consideration of the establishment of a State institution to facilitate and assist in funding a development transfer credit system;

"(K) proposal to designate specific areas within the special protection area suitable and appropriate for public acquisition or fee or less than fee interests;

"(L) a program for State and local implementation of the plan described in this subsection in a manner that will insure the continued, uniform, consistent protection of the special protection area in accord with the purposes of this section; and

"(M) pollution abatement measures, if appropriate.

"(2) During the development of the comprehensive management plan, the planning entity shall consult with, and consider the comments of, appropriate officials of any municipality and State or Federal agency which has jurisdiction over lands and waters within the area, other concerned organizations and technical and citizen advisory committees which shall be established by the Governor. The planning entity shall conduct public hearings at places within the special protection area for the purpose of providing an opportunity to comment on any aspect of the plan.

"(e) FINAL PLAN.—(1) The planning entity shall submit a final plan to the Governor for review.

"(2) The Governor shall approve or disapprove the plan. The Governor shall approve the plan if he determines that it protects underground sources of drinking water covered therein from contamination that may adversely affect the health of persons. In approving the plan, the Governor shall specifically designate the boundaries of the special protection area. The Governor shall submit a plan approved by the Governor to the Administrator for review.

"(3) Within 120 days, the Administrator shall approve the plan or submit in writing to the Governor his reasons for not approving it. The Governor may resubmit any plan which is not approved. The Administrator shall approve any plan which satisfies the requirements of this section.

"(f) RECHARGE ZONE.—For purposes of this section, the term 'recharge zone' means, with respect to any designated sole or principal source area, the recharge zone for such area as described in the designation by the Administrator under section 1424(e).

"(g) IMPLEMENTATION GRANTS.—If the Administrator approves the plan, he may provide to the State, on a matching basis, a grant of 50 per centum of the costs of implementing the plan (including land acquisition within the special protection area, a land credit exchange institution, and the monitoring of sources of contamination in the special protection area). In the case of an aquifer which serves a population of 50,000 or less, the Administrator may provide to the State, on a matching basis, a grant of 70 percent of such implementation costs.

"(h) ORDER TO PROVIDE DRINKING WATER.—(1) If the Administrator (or any State which has primary enforcement responsibility, within the meaning of section 1413, for public water systems under part B of this title) determines that—

"(A) any person has caused or contributed to the presence of any contaminant in any sole or principal source aquifer designated under section 1424(e) which supplies, or can reasonably be expected to supply, any public water system, and

"(B) the presence of such contaminant in such water system may adversely affect the health of persons unless such water is treated or alternative water supplies are provided, he may issue an order requiring such person to provide adequate supplies of potable drinking water to the persons served by such public water system.

"(2) Any interested person may obtain review of an order issued by the Administrator (or the State) under this section in the appropriate United States district court within thirty days after the issuance of the order.

"(3) Any person who violates, or fails or refuses to comply with an order under this subsection shall be liable to the United States (or to the State in the case of an action brought by the State) for a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 per day of violation. If any person fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty after it has become a final and unappealable order, or after the appropriate court of appeals has entered final judgment in favor of the Administrator (or the State), the Attorney General shall recover the amount for which such person is liable in any appropriate district court of the United States. In any such action, the validity and appropriateness of the final order under this section or the assessment of a civil penalty shall not be subject to review.

"(4) Nothing in this subsection or in any other provision of this Act shall be construed to restrict or preempt any right which any public water system or any other person (or class of persons) may have under any statute or common low to seek enforcement in any Federal, State, or local court, or in any administrative proceeding, of any provision of this Act or any other relief regarding the contamination of any drinking water supply.

"(i) NEW CRITERIA FOR AREAS DESIGNATED UNDER SECTION 1424(e).—(1) Within 12 months after the date of the enactment of this section, the Administrator shall, by rule, establish criteria for the areas to be designated under section 1424(e) after such date of enactment. The criteria shall include aquifer use, vulnerability, water quality and quantity, and unavailability of alternative drinking water supplies.

"(2) No designation made under section 1424(e) before the date of the enactment of this section shall be reevaluated pursuant to new criteria under this subsection.

"(j) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—(1) There are authorized to be appropriated for development of plans under this section, $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989. Not more than $2,500,000 may be used for planning in any such fiscal year for a single special protection area.

"(2) There are authorized to be appropriated for grants to implement plans approved under this section $75,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990. Not more than $20,000,000 may be used in any such fiscal year for implementation of the plan for a single special protection area. Matching grant assistance under this paragraph may also be used for the implementation of any water quality management plan expressly for a sole or principal source aquifer which plan is approved (before the date of the enactment of this section) by the Administrator under section 208 of the Water Pollution Control Act.".

(b) CROSS REFERENCE.—Section 1424(e) of such Act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "For provisions requiring the Administrator to establish new criteria for the areas to be designated under this section, see section 1426(h).".●

A TRIBUTE TO J.E. "NED" BEARDEN

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity and pay tribute to an outstanding businessman and citizen of the great State of Alabama, Mr. J.E. "Ned" Bearden.

Ned's wonderful success is the story of the American dream of hard work and dedication. And even though he has reached a pinnacle of achievement in the business world, he has not forgotten the people who assisted him along the way to the top.

It is with the greatest honor that I share some insight about J.E. "Ned" Bearden with my colleagues in the House of Representatives. Following is an article written by David F. Moore of the Shelby County Reporter about Ned Bearden:

J.E. "NED" BEARDEN: FORWARD HO!

(By David F. Moore)

In his youth he herded cows by horseback in Mountain Brook, on land that is now the golf course at Birmingham Country Club. Later, he drove a milk truck every day from Helena to Birmingham, returning in time to sleep an hour before going to the barn to milk more cows.

Today, his two Shelby County dairies boast more than 1,600 acres of land and some 800 head of cattle.

He never made it to college, but his recognition of the importance of education led him to serve as a trustee at Helena School. He was later elected to two terms on the Shelby County Board of Education.

He got his first taste of business at 16 while working in an uncle's grocery store for $2 a day plus board. Last year, as president of one of the Shelby County's leading banks, he was instrumental in organizing it's merger with a $3 billion statewide holding company.

For 12 years he served on the Shelby County Commission, and for 12 years he was president of the Shelby County Farm Bureau. He has been elected as "Citizen of the Year" by the Alabaster Civitans, and presently serves as an elder in the Riverchase Church of Christ.

But in a life that has thus far spanned several careers in three-quarters of a century, the man's pride and joy would appear to be his wife, Irene, and the 50 or more members of their "immediate" family.

"In fact," said Joel Elwyn Bearden—Ned, to most people—"the first $20 bill my wife and I saved, we put it under the mattress to pay for the delivery of our first baby."

J. E. Bearden was born Oct. 4, 1909, on a small farm in Jefferson County. Schoolmates at Shades Cahaba nicknamed him "Ned."

"They had to call you something," he said during an interview, sitting in a recliner in the den of his home on Bearden Lane, surrounded by seemingly hundreds of family pictures and civic plaques.

The son of dairyman Joel B. Bearden, Ned learned early about cows and farming,' milking them before and after school.

In those days, there were no stock laws, and cows roamed at will. This led to occasions of rounding up strays by horse from the golf greens then under construction at Birmingham County Club. At other times, he herded cows up 20th Street and through Five Points South—the bells around their necks ringing along city streets as they headed toward home.

Into his teens, Bearden worked his father's farm and at a neighboring dairy, as well as working in an uncle's store. At 19, his life took a major turn when he married Irene Lanning, a native of Akron, Ohio who was five years his senior and working at the time at Drennan Motor Company in Birmingham.

"I was too young to know what I was doing," Bearden grinned. "She was too smart to let a good thing go . . ."

"Do you call that conceited?" asked Irene good naturedly from her seat under a framed needlepoint piece that states: "God must have loved the Beardens. He made so many of them."

"Well, I got the right gal, even if I didn't know what I was doing," Bearden said.

Eight days after the wedding, on Jan. 1, 1929, the couple, along with Ned's father, started a joint venture dairy on 230 acres in Shelby County, along what is now State 261, the Helena Road. One of the first dairies in the county, Bearden herded their 60 cows from Jefferson County, down the Old Montgomery Highway, and across the Cahaba.

This was the start of Bearden Farms. Bearden the farmer went on to purchase surrounding land in Helena and Pelham, 900 acres in Vincent, and developed the operations into the largest dairy in Shelby County, and one of the largest in the state.

But the business almost failed during the depression. Because the dairy was losing money, Bearden's father wanted to close the operation.

His son, however, had already decided that he and Irene wanted to stay in Shelby County, so he bought the farm.

Irene used her business knowledge to keep the company books—or what there was of them. After paying all the notes, dairy expenses and hired labor, there was, for a time, but $1 of profit made each day.

"We liked to have starved to death then—and the cows, too," Bearden said.

During this time, he woke up at 2 a.m., drove his own milk truck to Birmingham every day, and returned in time to nap an hour or so before the cows had to be milked again. But the work paid off and the farm eventually prospered, leading Bearden to certain conclusions about life:

"I was lucky. The harder I worked, the luckier I was," said Bearden the family man. "But this was a family deal. It wasn't just me. That's where I've been fortunate."

The "family deal" developed into three boys and three girls—Kathlene, Joel, Leonard (killed in a 1968 plane crash along with Dr. Stanley Lacey and then Helena Mayor J.R. Davidson), Frances, Ralph and Shirley. Bearden said they quit having children when doctor fees went up to $35.

He credited Irene with keeping the family unit strong in those days, and recalled her milking a dozen cows while rocking a baby from a sling hung from the barn rafters. Indeed, in 1963, Progressive Farmer magazine named the Beardens as its "Master Farm Family."

Shortly after the children started attending Helena School—he had from one to six of them there for 19 years—citizens asked Bearden to serve as a school trustee.

"We put water in the school and toilets," he said.

Later, in 1957, he was elected to the board of education where he served until his 1969 election to the county commission.

Reflecting on his board of education terms, Bearden said that his toughest decisions dealt with integration, which was accomplished in Shelby County quietly and without major incident.

He said he views his largest contributions to education as helping the consolidation of a number of scattered community schools into larger schools, leading to the construction of Columbiana Middle, Chelsea, Vincent Elementary, Valley, Calera Elementary, Montevallo Elementary and Thompson Elementary Schools. Also during his two terms, additions were made at all the county schools.

As for being a county commissioner, Bearden said he prides himself most on the vast improvements and expansions made to the county highway system, which, during his terms, grew to national recognition. His toughest decision as commissioner was voting for the bond issue that financed the county jail and gave the county its first ever major indebtedness.

Bearden the politician said that public office taught him to learn to disagree with people, and still get along with them.

"Don't expect everybody to agree with you," he said. "And you'll also find out that you're not always right."

During this time, Bearden the businessman helped establish Consolidated Dairies, then served 20 years on its board of directors as the group grew from a dozen to 100 trucks. Too, he served as president of the Shelby County Farm Bureau and as a board member for the Federal Land Bank.

In 1977 he was named "Man of the Year" in agribusiness by the Birmingham Area Chamber of Commerce.

But as a Shelby County businessman, Ned Bearden remains best known for his involvement with the former First Bank of Alabaster.

He was an original stockholder in the bank when it opened in January of 1952 with George L. Scott as president. He later joined the board, and in 1967 followed Scott as the bank's second and last president, serving 17 years in that capacity.

"We work the farm here as a family," Bearden said. "And we really worked as a family in the management of the bank."

With vice presidents Don Lathem and Virginia Johnson, and the help of his secretary, Emma Higginbotham, Bearden led the bank through steady growth, opening branches on State 119 in Pelham, and, last year, across from Pelham City Hall.

Although he was looking to retire, he agreed to remain at the bank through its merger with SouthTrust of Alabama in 1984, a business move he considers to be beneficial not only to the county in general, but to the bank's employees as well.

He will remain with the bank as a consultant until next summer.

"I wouldn't take any credit for the success of the bank," Bearden said. "It was the good management I associate with."

Bearden the banker/civic leader/politician said he considers himself first and foremost, a farmer. True to that spirit, during his days as a bank president, he would go every morning to the barn at 6:30 "to see if I agreed with what was going on . . ."

Reluctant to take direct credit for the bank's success, he apparently feels the same way about the success of Bearden Farms. But the direction taken by the bank and farm—as well as Bearden's other endeavors—reflects a basic philosophy which the man has developed and followed over the years:

"Everything I was ever in, I always felt it was necessary to keep on progressing if you wanted to stay in business. At the end of every year, if you've stayed the same, if you haven't gone forward you've gone backwards."

Coupled with this forward push is Bearden's belief in sound management; good banking is good money management; good farming is good management of cows; a good education board member is a good school system manager; a good family is a good manager of, well, a family.

Twenty-three members of the Bearden family live on Bearden lane, across a 100 acre expanse of winter grass from the Helena Road. But that's hardly the entire crew. His six children have produced 20 grandchildren and 20 great-grand children—10 boys and 10 girls each way.

Sixty-two "immediate family" members showed up at Bearden's house for Christmas. Some 100 showed up last summer for Irene's 80th birthday, and again in the fall for Bearden's 75th. From all indications, everyone got a big kick out of seeing "Dad" ride his three-wheeler around the farm.

At this rate, what is Bearden the family man/farmer/businessman/politican planning for his 100th birthday?

"I'll probably find another acre or two to buy or clear. Run in a few cows on the three-wheeler. You've always got to have something going on, moving forward. If you don't, then you're not progressing."

Mr. Speaker, I am truly honored to know a man such as Ned Bearden. He is a shining example of the backbone of this country's business community which has made America such a great land of opportunity. Alabama and Shelby County are extremely fortunate to have a man of this caliber on their team.

All of us here in Congress should take a moment and reflect on his philosophy and business attitude. We need more men like Ned Bearden who have given so much of themselves in helping others. He knows the meaning of hard work and exemplifies the true idea of the American dream of success.

It is with the greatest pleasure that I share these words with my colleagues in the House of Representatives. J.E. "Ned" Bearden can never receive enough praises for all his work and time to so many worthy causes. There is no doubt in my mind that this tribute is well deserved by this outstanding individual.●

EDUCATION AND TRAINING FOR AFDC PREGNANT ADOLESCENTS AND YOUNG MOTHERS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today Representatives KENNELLY, MATSUI and I are introducing legislation which seeks to improve the opportunities for self-sufficiency among pregnant adolescents and young mothers who are eligible for Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC].

We are very happy to report that the bill is being endorsed by the American Public Welfare Association, which is made up of State and local agencies and professionals who administer the social welfare programs including AFDC. The legislation also has the endorsement of the Children's Defense Fund, a leading child advocacy group and the Child Welfare League, the largest national organization of child welfare agencies.

This education and training legislation takes AFDC in a new direction. When the AFDC Program was conceived in the depths of the Great Depression the goal was to keep mothers and their children together by providing an income maintenance program until they could get back on their feet. This was and still is a very worthy and necessary goal. The AFDC program has served as a lifeline and safety net for millions of women and their children over the years.

Now, however, it is time to reassess the AFDC program in light of the changes that have taken place in the AFDC population. We need to concentrate on the sources of welfare dependency among the different groups that make up the AFDC caseload in order to encourage self-sufficiency.

This legislation seeks to reduce welfare dependency among two AFDC groups. One is composed of pregnant teenagers and adolescent mothers who drop out of school and make up over one-half of the AFDC population. Among women 14 to 30 years of age receiving AFDC 61 percent bore their first child as a teenager. Today 91 percent of young mothers, ages 15 to 17, have neither full- or part-time employment and 72 percent of these women are on welfare; 41 percent of 18- and 19-year-old mothers are welfare dependent.

Clearly, all too frequently welfare dependency has been the direct result of teenage pregnancy and inadequate education and training. Pregnancy, in fact, is the No. 1 cause of teenage girls dropping out of high school. Eight out of ten teenage girls who first become mothers at age 17 or younger never complete high school. Worse yet, 9 out of 10 teenage girls who are 15 or younger and who become teenage mothers never complete high school. Without a high school education too many of these young mothers will become long-term welfare clients.

The second group targeted by this legislation is made up of AFDC mothers with children under 6, who are not now required to sign up for work programs and who never completed high school. These women experience marginal employability and too often chronic dependency on public social services.

Mr. Speaker, the medical, economic, and social costs of teenage pregnancy to teen mothers and their children and our society is enormous. Numerous studies have documented the adverse effects of early childbearing for teenage mothers and their children. Partly because they are less likely to seek prenatal care than older women they experience higher rates of toxemia, anemia, and other complications of pregnancy. Moreover, their children are more likely to be premature, have low birthweight, and suffer from physical and mental handicaps. In California alone, the annual MediCal—Medicaid—costs for delivering teen pregnancies, neonatal intensive care, and rehospitalization, cost the State in excess of $105 million each year.

Completion of high school is a key to the economic well-being of teenage mothers. It is estimated that a 10-percent increase of teen mothers completing high school would avoid $53 million in welfare costs in California. And a teenage woman graduating high from school is likely to earn $1,706 more per year, 1983 dollars, than a teen with 1 to 3 years of high school. In short, the greater the educational attainment of young mothers the lower the cost to the public.

In terms of the AFDC program, teen mothers without a high school diploma are twice as likely to become AFDC recipients. And nearly 60 percent of the total welfare budget is provided to women who first gave birth as a teen.

Perhaps most disturbing of all is the fact that children or teen parents are often locked within an almost invincible cycle of further teen pregnancy and poverty. Roughly 80 percent of girls who were mothers at 15 were themselves the daughters of women who had babies as teenagers.

Yet for all the research clearly demonstrating the adverse affects of adolescent mothers dropping out of school, little has been done to keep teenage mothers in school or to induce AFDC mothers with young children to seek a high school diploma or training. "Instead services are weak and have a limited impact," according to Elizabeth McGee, Director, of the Economic Self-Sufficiency for Teenage Parents Project, National Child Labor Committee. In testimony before the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families she further pointed out that the programs that do exist serve only a small percentage of the eligible population and disproportionately focus on pregnancy and crisis intervention. The existing programs are also often too narrowly focused and fail to coordinate their efforts with other services in the community. The most important criticism is that present programs fail to help these young mothers develop long-range plans toward economic self-sufficiency.

On the other hand there have been a limited number of successful demonstration projects by such organizations as Manpower Demonstration Research Corp. and the Teen Age Pregnancy and Parenting Project [TAPP] which have had some success in keeping young mothers in school and reducing welfare dependency.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to move beyond demonstration projects and establish a grant program to the States building on the knowledge learned from these successful programs.

This legislation seeks to create a comprehensive program which if enacted would improve the health and increase the likelihood of self-sufficiency among potential long-term welfare dependents. It integrates and coordinates existing services under title XX and parts B, foster care, and C, WIN, of title IV, the State program under title V and the Job Training Partnership Act. Employing a case management approach, each grant program would establish a comprehensive individualized program to meet the health, academic, and vocational needs of the participants. Child day care and transportation are provided in order to enable participation in the program.

The following is a detailed description of the grant program:

Law amending: Title IV A of the Social Security Act, new section to provide for special grants to States to assist pregnant individuals and mothers with dependent children under age 6 achieve self-sufficiency.

Type of program: Requires the Secretary to fund Grants to State agencies administering Title IV A with a requirement for coordination with other public and/or private nonprofit entities who meet the following qualifications.

Funding: Grant funds in 1985 would be provided to the State up to a maximum of 2 percent of the Federal share of the state's annual estimate of the title IV A benefit costs and to be increased by 1 percent in 1986 and an additional 1 percent in 1987. Establishes a permanent program funded at the 4 percent level. These funds would be in addition to the regular funds available for AFDC benefits.

Population included: First, must be under age 25, second, AFDC eligible, third, have not graduated high school, fourth, are pregnant or have a child under the age of 6, and fifth, providing care for the dependent child.

Participation: Participation shall be provided only on a voluntary basis. However, as a condition of participation the participants must be participating in an educational program leading to a high school diploma or the equivalent or training program.

Qualifications for grant: To qualify for a grant a State would have to provide assurance to the Secretary that a local grantee:

One, assigns an agency staff person, modeled on the case management approach, to each participant who in coordination with the participant establishes an individualized program based on an individualized assessment of need and set forth in an individualized written plan to meet the health needs of the participant and dependent child, and insures provision for and coordination of academic and vocational educational services, parenting skills, job counseling, employment readiness, job placement, and child day care.

Two, integrates and coordinates services at the local level otherwise available to pregnant teenagers and mothers with children under age 6 under title XX, parts B and C of this title, the State program under title V, and the Job Training Partnership Act, and under other Federal and State programs which would assist in achieving the objective of the program.

Three, extends categorical eligibility to these AFDC eligible recipients to assure that they receive medical services including but not limited to comprehensive prenatal and postpartum care and well-child care for the infant and children involved.

Four, coordinates academic and vocational educational programs with the local school system leading to a high school diploma or the equivalent.

Establish as a condition of participation that the participants must be participating in an educational program leading to a high school diploma or the equivalent or training program.

Five, provides job counseling, training, employment readiness and job placement and relevant supportive services independently or in conjunction with a program of employment and training under part C of this title, under the auspices of the Job Training Partnership Act, or under another Federal or State law.

Six, provides child care at the program site or utilizes any other child day care services which may be available, on a reimbursable basis, in the community. Such care must meet State or local standards. Child day care is to be provided while the caretaker parent is participating in any phase of the program. States are to use services that would be compatible with the goal of leading to self-sufficiency.

Seven, all child care and transportation which is necessary for a caretaker parent or pregnant teenager to participate effectively in a program under the grant is to be included without charge to such parent or pregnant teenager. In order to establish a smooth transition into the work force, day care while the parent is working will be provided on a sliding scale basis based on ability to pay for the first 6 months of work.

Eight, develop different programs based on the needs of the participants in recognition of the differences in age, family composition, cultural background and geographic location.

Nine, wherever possible establish the special vocational, educational, and training programs at a single site, with programs and activities being conducted in the local schools to the maximum extent feasible.

Ten, establish peer groups of participants, led by experienced group counselors, to meet and discuss program-related problems and issues.

Eleven, establish an outreach program to attract eligible women to the program.

Twelve, programs must provide the above services but would not be limited to these services and could provide such other health, family planning, education, training, or social services as needed for which the title IV A funds could be used if there is no other funding source.

Thirteen, any funds provided to participants to enable them to participate are not to be counted as income in determining AFDC eligibility or benefit level.

Repeal third trimester requirement: For those participating in the program repeal section 406(b) language and leave only "a pregnant woman but only if it has been medically verified that a child is expected to be born." Strike language in section 406(g).

Allow participation in post-secondary education: Section 402(a)(19)(A)(v) participation in postsecondary education programs will be permitted where appropriate.

Reporting requirement: The Secretary shall establish a systematic reporting system capable of yielding comprehensive data on which service figures and program evaluations shall be based. On or before each March 1 the Secretary shall submit to Congress a report describing the activities supported under this grant program during the fiscal year ending on the preceding September 30, including at minimum the data requirements listed below with the Secretary's plans and recommendations for the future.

Each program shall collect quantitative data through a management information system established at the site which will be conveyed to the State title IV A agency. The State agency receiving a grant under this section for a fiscal year shall provide a report to the Secretary at the close of such fiscal year which shall include the data gathered at the local level and shall include for each pregnant individual and mother served where applicable, their age, number of children, the length of time in the program, the type of education and training programs provided, and their current program status; a description of the outreach program used to attract program participants; a description of the education, training and other services, including child care and transportation, provided under such program or programs, including the cost of each such service, the number of participants utilizing the service; the coordination with other programs used in providing the service; and the administrative costs incurred in provided the service; the results achieved by such program or programs including, but not limited to, the number of participants who have obtained high school diplomas, or GED's; the number of participants who have completed the job training programs; and a description of how child care and other supportive services, including transportation have been provided to program participants.

Mr. Speaker, in order to reduce welfare dependency we must develop programs which encourage pregnant teens and young mothers to stay in school. We urge our colleagues to join us in this worthy goal of encouraging self-sufficiency among this disadvantaged population.●

MEDICARE SHOULD PAY FOR FOREIGN MEDICAL EMERGENCIES

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would allow the Medicare Program to reimburse Medicare patients for emergency medical expenses incurred outside the United States.

Under current law, an American citizen who suffers a medical emergency while outside this country cannot receive any reimbursement from Medicare for those expenses. The only exceptions to this rule are if the emergency occurs in the United States, but the closest hospital is outside the United States, or if the patient was traveling between Alaska and the lower 48. I don't think the Medicare Program should pay for routine medical care given outside the United States, nor do I think that we should pay for the medical expenses of persons who are living overseas. But I do think that Medicare should reimburse Medicare patients for any necessary emergency medical services which may be required no matter where the emergency happens to occur.

This problem was brought to my attention because several of my constituents suffered medical emergencies while vacationing in Canada. One person suffered a broken leg, while another had a serious heart attack. Both were treated in Canadian hospitals. When these people returned home, they discovered that Medicare would not reimburse them for any part of their medical expenses. Because Medicare would not pay for these expenses, my constituents faced serious economic difficulties. In order to correct this situation, my legislation would allow Medicare to reimburse patients for inpatient emergency medical expenses incurred outside the United States if the patient maintained his or her principal residence in the United States and if the patient had not been out of the United States for more than 180 days during the last year.

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this change in the law governing the Medicare Program.●

ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS NATIONAL PRESIDENT PRESENT AGENDA TO BRITISH AMBASSADOR

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I had the pleasure of meeting with the national president of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Joseph Roche together with James Delaney, chairman of the Irish American Unity Conference in advance of their meeting today with British Ambassador Sir Oliver Wright.

This important meeting takes place less than 2 weeks before Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher is scheduled to come to the United States to among other things address a joint session of the Congress on the afternoon of February 20. At the present time, I am circulating a letter in the House and Senate urging Mrs. Thatcher to include Northern Ireland in her address to the Congress.

As chairman of the 107-member bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs I wish to share with my colleagues a copy of the letter which Mr. Roche and Mr. Delaney presented today. It represents a summary of the major issues involving Northern Ireland which concern those of us on the ad hoc committee. It is my hope that they will obtain a response from the British Government and that it may provide the basis to open a new dialog on the issue of peace and justice for the people of Northern Ireland.

The letter follows:

ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS IN AMERICA INC.,
February 6, 1985.

Sir Oliver Wright,
British Ambassador to the United States, British Embassy, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: As leader of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, Inc., the oldest and largest Irish American Catholic lay organization, I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you or your representative and to present the following questions which are of prime concern to our membership who feel they must be addressed and satisfactory action taken before a just peace can come to the six counties in Northeast Ireland.

(1) The European Parliament has adopted a statutory ban on the use of plastic bullets. These bullets have been regularly used in the North of Ireland and have been responsible for the deaths of 13 youths. Mr. Whitelaw has stated these bullets are too dangerous and would never be used in England. What is your justification for ignoring this ban and continuing the use of these bullets in the North of Ireland?

(2) The Harland Wolfe and Short Bros. companies are so heavily subsidized and suported thru British Grants and Loans as to be in effect government corporations. The employment profiles of each of these companies reveal that better than 90% of the workforce is Unionist/Protestant. What specific steps are the English government taking to reduce government sponsored anti-catholic discrimination?

(3) The efficiency of the Diplock Courts is well known as is their failure as a mechanism to achieve justice. The English government has reserved for Northern Ireland exclusively every aberration of common law and jurisprudence. The injustices are many but the case of Michael Culbert, currently being monitored by Amnesty International, is typical. When and how will the English government redress the reprehensible abuse of the Diplock Courts and provide a measure of justice to Michael Culbert and others?

(4) In appealing to politicians in 1979, Pope John Paul II said "Do not condone or tolerate conditions which give excuse or pretext to men of violence . . . they claim that only violence brings about change . . . and that . . . political action cannot achieve justice. You politicians must prove them to be wrong". Spontaneous killings by government troops, paid perjurers, summary rejection of the New Ireland Forum report and government sponsored anti-catholic discrimination all point to politicians ignoring their responsibility. What hope can you offer democracy in Ireland if you continue to reject political initiatives?

(5) Gerry Adams, the elected leader of the legal Sinn Fein political party, is also an elected-Member of Parliament. He has traveled to England and spoken on behalf of his constituency. The U.S. Government has denied Mr. Adams a visa to speak in America and it is commonly accepted that it is in large measure due to England; implied if not formal request to deny such a visa. This offends even the most elemental aspects of democracy. Would you submit a letter to the State Department in support of the visa request of Mr. Adams and thus assist in the reversal of this extraordinary denial of freedom and civil rights?

(6) The English government is continually seeking to use our criminal justice system to extradite those seeking asylum in America. Despite the fact that every one of the rights granted in our Bill of Rights is denied to people in Northern Ireland you continually expect America to act as a colony and release them to you. In the most recent instance, Judge Sprizzo emphatically and bluntly stated that these refugees are entitled to political asylum. Why do you persist in debasing the very laws you claim to uphold by further persecuting people seeking freedom?

(7) The sovereignty, independence and unity of Ireland has been proclaimed and democratically adopted in the Proclamation of 1916, the Declaration of Independence of 21 January 1919, the Constitution of Ireland of 1 July 1937, the Republic of Ireland Act of 1948 and the Unanimous Declaration of Dail Eireann of 10 May 1949. Sovereignty and unity was called for in the 1921 Treaty which England has never denied obtaining under threat of arms. How can you justify a "guarantee" of union for a minority which has never been achieved by ballot or even contemplated in the original division of Ireland?

(8) The Ulster Defense Association is a paramilitary organization every bit as willing to use force as the I.R.A. This is a secret to no one save the English government which bans the I.R.A. but permits the U.D.A. to openly recruit, display weapons and join the R.U.C. or the British Army. How can you expect any respect for justice when such hypocrisy is openly tolerated?

(9) There seems to be some confusion over the official name of the municipal jurisdiction once known as Londonderry but now, thru democratic adoption of local statute, officially called Derry. Mr. Hurd and others in Northern Ireland, the AP and UI services and indeed the British Information Services in NYC still refer to Londonderry! Could you please advise me what the official name of this jurisdiction is and so advise others so that this subtle but nonetheless irritating matter could be put to rest?

(10) The Prime Minister's unequivocal rejection of the New Ireland Forum suggests that the elected officials in Ireland have exhausted the constitutional approach. The implications are as obvious as they are frightening. What justification does the English government offer for its continued denial of a role for the United States, the United Nations, the World Court or the European Parliament all of whom could reasonably expect to make a positive contribution to the otherwise deteriorating Anglo-Irish relations?

Awaiting your written reply on these matters I remain.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH A. ROCHE,
National President.●

TRIBUTE TO CORDELL WYNN

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute and recognize an outstanding educator in the State of Alabama. Following is an article about Dr. Cordell Wynn, president of Stillman College that recently appeared in the Tuscaloosa News:

STILLMAN PRESIDENT ROSE ABOVE POVERTY WITH EDUCATION

TUSCALOOSA.—Stillman College President Cordell Wynn said he heeded his grandmother's advice and found that the way out of poverty is through education.

When growing up in Eatonton, Ga., Wynn said his grandmother told him, "Boy, you will go to college. You will finish high school and go to college. You will be somebody."

Today Wynn is somebody. He's president of one of the few historically black colleges that is financially sound and growing. He has also held a variety of federal education appointments and recently was named to the State Ethics Commission by Gov. George C. Wallace.

Wynn still has vivid memories of life in rural Georgia during the 1940's and 1950's.

"The only way out was high school and college," he said. "In the community where I grew up, there were very few blacks completing high school."

As a high school senior, Wynn said he was influenced by his teachers and the principal of his school, a "bright black young man who taught me how to take tests. He taught me how to think big and positively and not to focus on the negative but to focus on the positive."

Wynn did well on the national Pepsi Cola Merit Scholarship exam and received a two-year Pepsi scholarship to Boston University. He later received a degree from Fort Valley State College in Georgia.

Wynn said he early on devoted his life to what was, and still is, the only sure way out of poverty with no options—education.

During his climb up the educational ladder, Wynn has been offered several jobs at prestigious institutions, but he has chosen to remain at traditionally black schools. The world has changed much in 30 years, Wynn said, but he remembers where he came from and that hundreds of thousands of young blacks are still back there.

A way out must be maintained for them, he said.

With most traditionally black colleges in jeopardy, he said he feels an obligation to fulfill the charge his grandmother gave: "Bring something back to help us move on and move forward."

His teachers, almost all women, helped him complete the foundation he needed to compete.

"They wanted to be there. They wantd to help the students. It was not the best salary," but they all knew education was the only hope of the black children of Eatonton "to get out and cope with the conditions of society."

After a stint in the Air Force, and college, Wynn returned to Georgia.

He taught in a rural south Georgia elementary school, where he met the somewhat shy young teacher he married the next summer.

The moved to Macon, Ga., where they lived the next 19 years, with Mrs Wynn teaching and Wynn working as a teacher, principal, counselor and assistant superintendent of education.

He helped draft one of the nation's most celebrated and successful integration plans, after which he went to the White House to be director fo the National Youth Corps and received a number of other national committee appointments.

He served as president of the Georgia Education Association and on the state accrediting agency and, on deciding he had made as many contributions as he could in Georgia, moved on to Alabama to become dean of the education school of Alabama State University in Montgomery.

He later became dean of the education school at Alabama A&M University in Huntsville, and in 1982, he became president of the Presbyterian-affiliated Stillman College in Tuscaloosa.

Under his leadership the school has paid off its debts, increased its federal funding and enlarged its enrollment from 300 to 800.

When complimented on his success Wynn gives credit to the people who helped him out of poverty in rural Georgia.

"That's what my mama taught me," he said, "always be appreciative."

The field of education is fortunate to have a man of Dr. Wynn's caliber on its team. Not many people achieve the measure of admiration and respect that Dr. Wynn enjoys. He has earned that admiration and respect because he genuinely cares about people and about the welfare of education in Alabama.

I am honored to be able to share this story with my colleagues in the House of Representatives, and certainly wish him well in his future endeavors.●

PAUL KIRK TAKES CHARGE AT THE DNC

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, on February 1, Paul G. Kirk, Jr., was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Kirk is an excellent choice for this demanding position. I have known him for years and consider him to be a man of rare ability and unquestionable integrity. He is in my judgment precisely the type of person we need to renew and restore the Democratic Party.

The challenges facing Mr. Kirk are numerous and difficult. As a recent column by David S. Broder makes clear, however, his election last Friday gives Democrats the assurance that those challenges will be met in a straightforward and effective manner. I would like to insert Mr. Broder's column at this point in the RECORD.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PAUL KIRK

(By David S. Broder)

In Paul G. Kirk Jr., the Democrats have found themselves a national chairman better than they know—and maybe better than they deserve. If character and ability count for anything in the world of politics, and I am naive enough to think they do, then the Democratic Party is in good hands.

I say this confidently, having watched and dealt with Kirk for about 15 years. And I say it emphatically, because Kirk's case illustrates the bind we often find ourselves in as reporters in trying to bridge the gap from the facts to the truth.

The facts about Paul Kirk, as reported in the stories about his election last week as the new chairman of the Democratic National Committee, are simple: He is a 47-year-old native of Massachusetts, a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School, who worked for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) as chief of staff for eight years and later took a leave from his Washington law practice to direct Kennedy's bid for the 1980 Democratic presidential nomination.

In the contest for the party chairmanship, Kirk was the choice of the leaders of the AFL-CIO, who delivered about one-fifth of his total votes and most of his margin of victory in the fight with former North Carolina governor Terry Sanford.

To decribe Kirk, therefore, as a Kennedy-labor Democrat, as all the stories did, is accurate. But it misses the main point, which is that he is a man whose integrity and ability make him exceptional—even in the eyes of those who have most often opposed him.

Former Democratic National chairman, Robert S. Strauss is one of those people. "In 1980," he recalled the other day, "he [Kirk] spoke for the Kennedy campaign, and I was the chairman of the [Jimmy] Carter campaign. The tensions between the two groups were rather severe, but I could always talk with Paul. Our relationship, instead of just surviving, thrived. He always kept his word. . . ."

Strauss said that he could sympathize with Kirk this week, because "when I came in as national chairman [in 1972], my reputation was that I was a very conservative Texas Democrat, a John Connally-Lyndon Johnson man, who somehow had financial ties with some big labor leaders.

"The truth of the matter was that I wasn't owned by Connally, Johnson or labor, but it took me a while to prove it. Now, I'm aware that some people say that Kirk's election is bad for the Democratic Party, because it sends a signal that labor and Kennedy have taken over. It's not true.

"To begin with," Strauss said, "Kirk is a centrist in his thinking. He can represent and do political business in the South and West just as well as in the Midwest and the East. He's a man of integrity and honor, and when you know him at all, that is what comes through.

"I have never been on the same side as Paul in the disputes within the party, but I tell you that at the end of a year, he will be seen as his own person, a man who does his homework, keeps his word, and is on the way to rebuilding the party."

As a reporter, I would just add that my experience confirms every point of that judgment. In the Kennedy entourage, which was often arrogant, sometimes secretive and always protective, Kirk stood out as a man who was consistent, stable, reliable and reasonable—and who balanced his sense of personal and political loyalty to the senator with a view of the world larger than the advancement of one individual's ambitions.

He will need all those qualities—and some luck—in his new job, for he faces daunting challenges. Despite his denials, he is viewed as an agent of Lane Kirkland or Ted Kennedy by many in the party. His election left bruised feelings among key fund-raisers, governors and some black leaders. Every move he makes, every appointment he announces, will be scrutinized for hidden motives.

And that is why it will come down to something we journalists have trouble defining or articulating—a question of character.

In his first speech as chairman, Kirk told the national committee members, "You have honored me today with your confidence. * * * I ask you also for your trust. * * * Without mutual trust, each of us will be tempted to make unreasonable demands on one another—to protect our particular cause or to advance our own special agenda. If we let that happen, we will be viewed as nothing more than a collection of narrow groups looking inward in conflict and dividing ourselves in a struggle for scraps of a declining political party. Thankfully, we have another choice."

In choosing Kirk, the Democrats have given themselves another chance, just as the selection of Ray C. Bliss in 1965 and Bill Brock in 1977 gave Republicans a chance to recover from their election defeats in the previous years. When they took over, those two men were viewed with skepticism by many in the GOP. But they set an example of independence, hard work and, yes, character that lifted the spirits of their party and restored its political credibility.

Paul Kirk has the opportunity—and ability—to do that same thing for the Democrats.●

CREDIT UNION FOOD STAMP REDEMPTION AUTHORITY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 968 to permit federally insured credit unions to redeem food stamps. This legislation is prompted by several problems in inner-city areas. First, bank branch closings have removed many outlets for the redemption of food coupons, thereby hampering grocers with a higher percentage of customers dependent on food coupons. Second, ever increasing fees for the processing of food coupons by the remaining banks are discouraging the acceptance of the coupons by other grocers.

Permitting credit unions to redeem the coupons presents a way to address this problem. In my district for example, there are many credit unions but an ever decreasing number of banks. Permitting credit unions to process the stamps increases the outlets for redemption while also offering the possibility to lower the fees to process the stamps.

From a credit union perspective, such a simple change in the Food Stamp Act will offer an opportunity for credit unions to better serve the needs of their members and communities. Now, some grocers are forced to travel to a bank to cash in their food coupons. Eventually, they may decide to transfer all of their business to an institution that can handle all of their financial needs.

Since larger credit unions have direct access to the Federal Reserve System—which is used for processing food coupon redemptions—and have a Federal insurance program comparable to the FDIC and the FSLIC, I believe that this simple change will provide a safe and effective remedy to the food stamp redemption problem.

Both the National Association of Federal Credit Unions and the National Credit Union Administration support the redemption of food coupons by credit unions. I have included their letters of support for such legislation.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FEDERAL CREDIT UNIONS,
Washington, DC, February 7, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT GARCIA,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE GARCIA: The National Association of Federal Credit Unions (NAFCU), the only national organization exclusively representing the interests of credit unions chartered by the federal government, strongly supports your efforts to restore credit union authority to redeem food stamps. Your legislation (H.R. 968) would restore an authority once construed to be granted to credit unions which would enable them to better meet the needs of their members—particularly those credit unions situated in urban areas, serving members with low to moderate incomes.

Prior to passage of the Food Stamps and Commodity Distribution Amendments of 1981 ("The 1981 Act"), Section 10 of the Food Stamp Act stated that "regulations issued pursuant to this Act shall provide for redemption of coupons . . . through banks" (7 U.S.C. 2109). Subsequently, the Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution Amendments of 1981 (Public Law 97-98) amended the Food Stamp Act by striking the word "bank" every time it appeared in Section 10 of the Food Stamp Act, and inserting in its place "financial institutions which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) or the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC)." As a result of this amendment, federally insured banks and savings and loan associations may now redeem food stamps for their customers, while federally insured credit unions are precluded from performing a similar function. NAFCU wholeheartedly agrees with the view that credit unions are quite different than banks and savings and loans. However, we do not believe that the difference necessarily requires that federally insured credit unions be prohibited from redeeming food coupons. This anomaly would be rectified by amending the Food Stamp Act, as you propose, by including in the category of institutions permitted to redeem food stamps those insured by "the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund."

NAFCU also believes that the legislation you have proposed is necessary and consistent with the traditions of the credit union movement. Founded as cooperatives to provide members with an opportunity to borrow at reasonable rates, credit unions have consistently striven to provide fundamental financial services to their members. In areas such as your Congressional District, credit unions remain one of the last providers of lifeline financial services. By authorizing credit unions to once again redeem food stamps, you authorize them to offer a service that is directly related to the fundamental needs of their members.

Seeking the opinion of E.F. Callahan, Chairman of the National Credit Union Administration, on authorizing federally insured credit unions to redeem food stamps NAFCU has received correspondence indicating his willingness to lend support to such an initiative. For your review a copy of that letter is enclosed.

Mr. Garcia, NAFCU appreciates your efforts to enable credit unions to redeem food stamps and would be willing to do whatever we can to assist you.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. HUTCHINSON,
President.

NATIONAL CREDIT UNION
ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, DC, February 4, 1985.

Mr. KENNETH L. ROBINSON,
Executive Vice President, National Association of Federal Credit Unions, Arlington, VA.

DEAR KEN: This is in response to your request for my views on legislation to permit food stamp redemption at credit unions.

Presently, only institutions insured by the FDIC and the FSLIC may redeem food stamps. I can think of no reason why credit unions should not be able to contribute to the efficiency of the Federal food stamp program. Therefore, I will be pleased to lend my support to legislation authorizing credit unions insured by the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund to redeem food stamps.

Please keep me informed of your efforts on this issue.

Sincerely,

E.F. CALLAHAN,
Chairman.●

THE RAILROAD ANTIMONOPOLY ACT OF 1985

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation known as the Railroad Antimonopoly Act to correct anticompetitive practices in the railroad industry. By filling a gap in the antitrust laws, this bill would ensure that competition, not monopoly power, operates as the force which determines certain freight rates in the railroad industry.

The introduction of this bill builds on the momentum begun during the last Congress when Senator DENNIS DECONCINI and I proposed a similar measure which was the subject of hearings in both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees. I am pleased to note that Senator DECONCINI is again introducing the Railroad Antimonopoly Act in the Senate, and also that I am joined by Congressmen SYNAR, GLICKMAN, UDALL, ENGLISH, WATKINS, MCCURDY, and DORGAN as original cosponsors of this measure.

Railroad regulation began in 1887 and for almost a century, strict controls were justified on the theory that the industry had the characteristics of a public utility. However, because of changes in the marketplace and new demands on the transportation system, it became clear over the years that the regulatory approach was no longer working. Thus, in 1980, Congress passed the Staggers Act which sought to reduce the regulatory burden on the railroads which was hampering their ability to earn a profit. As a result, we are now witnessing the revival of that industry's economic health.

However, deregulation is not working in every circumstance. In fact, railroad shippers and customers which have no transportation alternatives are subject to the monopoly power of individual rail carriers without effective regulatory protection. Known as captive shippers, these companies are dependent upon rail for movement of their goods and are so situated that only a single carrier can provide that service. Although it was Congress' intent in the Staggers Act not only to free the railroads from restrictive regulation but also to protect captive shippers, the Interstate Commerce Commission [ICC] has failed to effectively provide any safeguard against monopoly power abuse.

Without strong marketplace discipline or meaningful regulation, captive shippers have no ability to bargain with the sole service railroad or successful challenge the rate imposed. As a result, captive shippers are forced to pay excessive and arbitrary rates for rail transportation. And ultimately, of course, so do the consumers of these captive services and products.

This problem is especially acute with regard to shippers of bulk products. Because of their location, volume, and the distance needed to be moved, such materials as coal, grain, fertilizer, and the like are almost totally dependent upon rail service. Other nonbulk transportation modes are simply not feasible. In the situation of coal, for example, the rail transportation costs can more than triple the mine price of coal. This is bad news to the Nation's consumers of coal-generated electricity.

My bill seeks to remedy this problem by restoring competiton in bulk commodity rail service in areas now served by only one railroad. The bill achieves this by making it a violation of the antitrust laws for a rail carrier to monopolize by failing to offer a captive shipper of bulk commodities competitive rates or by denying such captive shippers and other railroads access to limited stretches of its trackage in areas where that rail carrier has a monopoly. My bill would provide that if a sole rail carrier chooses not to offer a competitive rate, the shipper or another rail carrier could exercise trackage rights, at a reasonable rate of compensation, to assure competition. The penalties for the continued monopolization of such tracks would be those in the antitrust laws.

This bill is not designed to open trackage of a rail carrier to any other carrier who wishes to use the owner railroad's lines. The purpose of this bill is to prevent the owner rail carrier from both maintaining exclusivity of control and monopoly pricing.

I certainly believe that railroads should be able to make a fair profit on the services they provide. And this bill envisages a healthy common carrier railway system. However, a monopoly railroad's denial of competitive rail service is neither fair nor competitive, and thus diminishes the health of our entire economy. The Railroad Antimonopoly Act will restore an equitable competitive balance to the railroad industry and to our economy as a whole.●

TAX REFORM: YES—WITH THREE CONDITIONS

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Honorable DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, on the potential pitfalls of tax reform. Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI makes several important points which will be of interest to all Members.

TAX REFORM: YES—WITH THREE CONDITIONS

(By Dan Rostenkowski)

Nixon goes to China. Reagan embraces tax reform.

The "turnabout" is one of the most durable and effective political gambits. With a quick U-turn, the president has at once taken on his most loyal corporate supporters and caught his liberal opponents flatfooted. His State of the Union address should be a masterwork of populist Democratic rhetoric: "We must tax those large corporations and wealthy moguls who have not paid their fair share—and reward working families who have been caught in the squeeze for so long." It's a very compelling campaign.

Count me in.

But only if the president will back his speech with the same political force he put behind his tax and budget cuts four years ago. That's the great unknown as we begin the 99th Congress.

Tax reform is a noble, if not novel, crusade. For the last 20 years, "reform" has played leap-frog with other tax slogans, such as "capital formation," industrial policy," "job creation" and "energy independence." Each year brings a new cause which quickly eclipses the last. No sooner have we begun the task of encouraging the poor to work than we are asked to boost charitable giving, or hasten the rehabilitation of our inner cities, or promote single-family home ownership—or reduce the deficit. Then, as the cycle comes around, we are asked to undo much of these hard-fought issues in the name of "reform."

The Treasury reform proposal is both broad and aggressive, containing initiatives that for years have gathered dust in the bottom drawers of liberal tax experts: do away with the capital gains preference, scrap the investment tax credit, increase taxes on fringe benefits, restrict the use of the foreign tax credit, eliminate mortgage deductions on vacation homes. All that from an administration that four years ago spread more butter and jam on the tax code for business and the wealthy than we have seen in decades.

The Treasury should be applauded for its proposal. In some cases the plan is too complicated to administer—never mind explain—to common folk. In others, it begs fights that can't be won. (Scholars are far bolder than politicians.) But on the whole, the proposal adopts the right approach, broadening the tax base and reducing rates, and it deserves intensive review.

Some conditions must be met, however, before the campaign for tax reform moves very far. The first, and most critical, is forceful, visible and personal support from the president. It isn't enough to recite tax reform's litany in the State of the Union address. Thumping reform around the country, jawboning special interest groups and maintaining constant contact with Congress must immediately follow.

One measure of the president's commitment will be his willingness to back off his own revenue-losing proposals, including enterprise zones and tuition tax credits, that both compound our deficit dilemma and violate the very spirit of tax reform. Another test will be his ability to withstand the pressure exerted by hefty Reagan supporters to exempt them or their enterprises from the sweep of reform. Any backsliding will greatly compromise his campaign on the Hill—and stir the old question of "fairness."

The second condition demands that the president follow the traditional legislative path. The changes contained in the Treasury proposal are as profound as they are dramatic. Unraveling 30 years of tax law, if it's done well, can't be done overnight. (The 1954 overhaul took three years.) Recalculating the goals of the Internal Revenue Code, sorting out what incentives still work from those that don't (or are patently excessive) and trying to balance the economic consequences make for a delicate and lengthy ordeal.

That means passing through each gate on the legislative slalom—from the first day of hearings all the way to the Rose Garden. It cannot be done through shortcuts, like Blair House commissions or the old "Gang of 17." It cannot be the work of one party or one house. A reform package of this magnitude—with such high political and economic stakes—has got to be built with great care, and by many hands, if it is to endure.

The third condition is that tax reform must not divert us from the overwhelming obligation of deficit reduction. Even with presidential leadership, mounting yet another tax crusade will not be easy in these days of general economic good news. For the moment, there is little pressure for deficit reduction beyond the odd editorial writer or Wall Street pessimist. Crisis, which increasingly propels government to make nasty choices, remains all but invisible. The horror stories of the last economic cycle have long since faded.

The reality, however, is that $200 billion deficits, like so many helium balloons, must one day collapse. What better way—what better time—for the second Reagan administration to define its economic vision than to willingly negotiate a balanced deficit reduction package with Congress? As the president asked in his recent Inaugural Address: "If not us, who? If not now, when?"

The alternative, of course, is to wait for crisis to rush us to belated judgment.

Congress, and particularly the Democratic Party, has good reason to be apprehensive about the second Reagan term. We are at once gun-shy and weary after four years of combat; we know how facile he is at dodging blame; we appreciate his ability to lift the country above its economic concerns, like the deficit. Nor do we ignore the magnitude of his popularity.

Most Democrats are ready to press ahead on some very difficult issues, including deficit reduction and tax reform. As an opening gesture of my commitment to both in this Congress, I will offer James Baker the earliest opportunity to bring the administration proposal to the Hill. In the meantime, it would bolster the nation's economic stability, if not lobby fees, to temper tax speculation and wait for Secretary Baker's report.

If, in the months ahead, the president's commitment to tax reform proves more than a populist fling, he will not only have pulled off a political "turnabout" of some proportion, but may also have accomplished much more on the economic front in his second term than cynics now predict.●

TRIBUTE TO MAYOR WILLIAM A. COLEMAN

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize Mr. William A. Coleman, who has just recently retired after serving as mayor of Riverside, AL, for 24 years. I believe that congratulations are certainly in order for this loyal public servant and his outstanding record.

Following is an article about Mayor Coleman that appeared in the St. Clair News-Aegis that I would like to share with my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

WILLIAM COLEMAN RETIRES AS MAYOR OF RIVERSIDE AFTER 24 YEARS

(By Kelly Bryan)

William A. Coleman.

You might call him a folk hero. But, since he is an actual, living person; the analogy doesn't quite fit.

You might call him a humorist. But, even Will Rogers broke into an occasional grin over one of his mocking tales.

You might call him a politician. But, that part of his life does not detail the variety of accomplishments he has made.

Perhaps the best single word to pin on the man who retired from politics in 1984, after serving some 24 years as mayor of Riverside is "character."

There is not a person in St. Clair County who has not heard of the big man in Riverside answering to Bill Coleman. Many of the tales that encircle the Riverside native are based on fact, but like the remembrance of Davy Crockett killing that "bar" at the age of three, exaggerations have taken place.

The facts.

Coleman was born in 1919 in the corner of the Riverside house he has reared his own family in. He has two older brothers, both dead now, and one sister, who lives in Birmingham.

Hard work has always been a part of his life. By the time he was 13 years old, Coleman says he had already "made a crop" by himself, which meant the clearing of land with a mule.

He completed the 12th grade at Pell City High School. And, then managed to get a scholarship to Birmingham Southern College for his abilities as a football player. Coleman spent one year as a guard on the team, before the program was cut out.

He traveled to Mississippi Gulf Coast Junior College in Perkingston. Before he was finished with college, Coleman had spent time in classrooms at Auburn University and the University of Tennessee and Howard College (now Samford). His main course of study was forestry.

Much of Coleman's work experience, however, lies in transportation. He began working on a ferry in Riverside. The boat travel was necessary for the automobiles since a bridge was not constructed. And, even after a bridge was completed, Coleman and his family were still in demand since drivers were forced to pay 50 cents per car, and five cents per passenger to cross the toll bridge. "We put them across for a quarter. And, I know we handled up to 300 cars a day," said Coleman.

His next job meant the shoveling of some 34 tons of coal between Birmingham and Atlanta for the railroad. When the World War II started, train engineers were desperately needed, but not available. Coleman found himself the engineer of a steam locomotive. And, while there was talk of cut backs when the diesel train came into operation in 1944, Coleman traveled the rails for another 37 years.

When his father died, Coleman sold his Birmingham home and returned to the family homestead determined to manage the family's farm. This involvement did not interfere with his railroad job. On the contrary, Coleman rolled out of bed to work on the farm, drove into Birmingham to work on the train and then started all over again. "Sometimes I got as much as two hours sleep," he remembers.

Coleman met a University of Alabama graduate who was teaching school in Pell City. "I carried Frances to Birmingham on our first date. Sixty days later, we were married. We are talking love at first sight," stressed Coleman, who looks over at his wife and says, "Isn't she the prettiest thing." As if that comment did not convince you, he digs through a stack of family photos and comes up with the engagement picture of his wife. "Now, do you see what I mean."

Many people would not take on the duties of a railroad job and still work a large farm. And, hearing that Coleman also has spent 28 years as a director of the Coosa Valley Production Credit Association convinces many a person that the bounds between reality and fantasy have been crossed.

But, it is true. Coleman even served as the chairman of the board for the institution with 500 stockholders for 18 years.

Wait, there's more. Coleman also worked as a chicken farmer. "I hauled eggs to 17 different grocery stores and had 26 chicken houses to meet the demand."

And, when he had to purchase more feed to meet the needs of his chicken farm, Coleman decided to get into the feed mill business.

Wait, there's still more. Coleman had a dairy farm with some 544 head of cattle that were milked daily. Since his feed mill was operating so efficiently, Colemen ventured into the hog business. Before long he counted some 7,000 hogs dining on the feed he was producing himself.

At this point, Coleman stops, looks you right in the eye and admits, "I done worked myself to death."

Work is not the only thing that Coleman knows. Humor is as much a part of his life as clocking in. Coleman is not only the main character in many a tall tale; he can spin the stories as easily as Will Rogers used to.

The recollections and tales are as colorful as the man is himself. The stories are seasoned heavily with four-letter words and combinations thereof. But, his language is as much a part of the story as the plot is.

His favorite narratives tell of his physical abilities when provoked. He told some teenage boys who kept racing their cars up a street where children were playing that he was going to beat the hell out of them if he heard another tire squealing. He also drove up to the house of a culprit who ran over a "nice sign" in Riverside and disciplined the youth, though he didn't have the police with me. "I didn't have nothing," he adds. If at this point, you look warily at him, he leans in closer and asks, "You don't think I can still do some damage when I want to."

All the while, Coleman is spicing up the stories, he looks for a disbelieving eye or a person who can't quickly catch on to his dry, biting humor. If so, watch out. He will intensify his spiel.

He enjoys seeing that he made a person laugh, whether it is at his outrageousness or his vocabulary, but Coleman does not allow himself to laugh out loud often. Instead, he permits himself only an intermittent chuckle. His enjoyment is reflected in his eyes, as they narrow in delight when he has honed in on a victim not prepared for his acerbic wit.

Coleman's entry into politics, from which he gathers most of his fame, came initially when he ran for county commissioner. "I beat out a veteran commissioner for the title of the third district." With that system of election, Coleman looked out strictly for his own district.

When, he subsequently ran for election, Coleman was forced to vie for the title in a county-wide arena. And, since he "didn't believe in shaking hands," Coleman lost the bid, though he proudly tells of carrying his entire district with the exception of only eight votes. "That was the best day of my life," says Coleman about the defeat.

It was in 1960 that Coleman was elected mayor of Riverdale. "People may have called me a tough mayor, but they could not call me unfair," he stressed.

"I helped to build Riverdale into a pretty nice place. And it has been a lot of fun messing with the stuff and playing with it," answers Coleman when asked about his political motivations.

Highlights of his political career, according to him, include the collection of some $607,000 to raise the bridge. If he had not spearheaded the movement, Coleman said the town would have been cut off. "It took seven years to get the money to raise that bridge, but it was done," said Coleman.

He matter-of-factly tells of building the city hall structure without any federal funds. Something that many majors cannot even think of telling their constituents.

And Coleman's biggest delight is the water system that he finagled due to his banking expertise and determination. The town is now at the point, according to Coleman, to use the revenue coming in from the water system to pay off the two outstanding debts on the million dollar facility.

"I have never wanted any praise for the work I have done for Riverdale. But, at the same time, I would have to be crazy to keep on going like I have. I believe in Riverdale and I want to be part of it. But there are a lot of places I want to go and I feel I can do Riverdale more good outside the confines of the mayor's office," said Coleman.

Bill Coleman.

Perhaps, "character" is not enough. Some people prefer the adjective, "legendary."

Mayor Coleman is truly an outstanding individual. His devotion and service to the people of Riverdale, St. Clair County, and the State of Alabama, are outstanding in the public service arena.

I am honored to be able to share this story with my colleagues and certainly wish him well in his future endeavors.●

MATTHEW LANDRY

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, much work needs to be done in the depressed areas of our cities. Too many people have been left behind as the engine of economic recovery has brought greater wealth to many of our Nation's businesses.

In Miami, efforts have been made to help minority entrepreneurs get started, and these efforts are beginning to show some success.

Matthew Landry recently became the first businessman to pay off a startup loan from the Business Assistance Center, an agency designed to provide help to minority businesses. The money for such loans was provided by contributions from local private business leaders. Some of the most important companies in South Florida contributed to this fund, and it is an excellent example of what private industry can do to try to improve the lot of those in the inner city.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to include in the RECORD an article from the Miami Herald which describes how Mr. Landry, through hard work and determination, has made his company successful.

The article follows:

MINORITY FLOOR FIRM IS FIRST TO PAY OFF A START-UP LOAN

(By Cornelius Foote Jr.)

Matthew Landry, 41, owner of Landry Floors Inc., is a big man with a small company who is quickly paying off his debts.

He is the first businessman to pay off his $7,500 start-up loan from the 2-year-old Business Assistance Center, an agency that provides technical and financial assistance to minority businessmen.

"This is an indication of what can be done," said Charles Babcock, president of a Miami-based home builder and chairman of the board for the center. "I'm very pleased that we have a loan paid off. He's coming along and becoming very successful."

The center returned the canceled original loan note to Landry, a six-foot, three-inch, 254-pound man, last week.

"I'm extremely happy," said Landry, a bearded and mustachioed man dressed in green polyester slacks, a black T-shirt and white sneakers spotted with hardened floor wax.

THE INCUBATOR

Landry opened the wood and ceramic floor-installation and refinishing company two years ago when his former employer of more than 15 years, Floors and Interiors, went out of business.

The business employs four people and is housed in the Business Assistance Center's "incubator" at 6600 NW 27th Ave.

Landry Floors is one of eight businesses that has its offices in the center, which provides start-up businesses with low-cost office rent. The center provides a secretary pool and helps him with his bookkeeping.

"I wasn't afraid [to open my own business] because I had had such a rough childhood," said Landry, one of 15 children.

He grew up in a Houston, Texas, orphanage and came to Miami at age 18 to search for his parents, whom he eventually found, he said.

"But because I'm black, at first people wouldn't give me jobs," Landry said. "They felt I wasn't qualified. Even now, when I make a bid, people are a little cautious because they don't think I can do the work.

"My objective is just to go do the job and not get into any personality conflicts. I try to conduct myself as a professional. Once they see how good the job is, they thank me."

The big boost to Landry's business was getting a $17,500 contract with the Dade County School Board to replace and refinish the floors of several area schools. The contract has since been increased to nearly $50,000. The contract is part of the board's "set-aside" program, designed to allot a portion of contracts to minority entrepreneurs.

Since winning the contract, Landry's firm has installed a floor in Miami-Jackson High's auditorium and repaired other damaged floors in the 57-year-old building.

He has also done work at Kinloch Elementary, South Hialeah Elementary and North Miami Elementary schools. Landry's other clients are private homeowners throughout Dade County.

"I've learned to work real hard, be real disciplined and do good work," said Landry, father of 10.

SEED CAPITAL FUND

Ron Frazier, vice chairman of the Business Assistance Center remembers when Landry first came to him for help.

"I met Landry while I was president of the Miami-Dade Chamber of Commerce," said Frazier, owner of an architectural firm, Ronald E. Frazier & Associates. "I directed him to the BAC to get the financial assistance he needed. He's now a symbol that you can achieve some things if you have the ability and the opportunity."

Landry's timing to start a business coincided with the formation of the private, nonprofit Business Assistance Center. The center established a "seed-capital fund" in which there is nearly $2 million for loans to black entrepreneurs starting a business. Local private business leaders joined forces and raised the money for the center in the aftermath of Miami's 1980 riots.

Storer Communications, Southeast Bank, Barnett Bank, County National Bank and City National Bank are among the contributors to the fund.

As one of the first applicants to the program, Landry received an initial loan of $7,500, which he has paid. Landry has also finished paying off an additional $10,000 loan. He still has a $5,000 loan he used to purchase equipment.

"[Landry] has never been a dull moment," said Newall Daughtrey, executive director of the center. "He entered a field in which there aren't too many black businessmen."

Landry's immediate business plans are to increase his staff by two, preferably two women, he said.

"There aren't many women in this business, and I want to train them how to do this kind of work," he said. "I also want to train and employ people in Liberty City who might be poor and hungry."

Added Daughtrey, "We see him as a person in the business community who can employ others and bring something to the community."●

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, last week the President transmitted to the Congress the first annual report of the National Endowment for Democracy.

The report presents a detailed picture of the Endowment's first year of operations—both the organizational foundation which has been laid and the projects which were initiated with the first year's funds. The remarks which follow were delivered by the Endowment's President Carl Gershman at a ceremony commemorating "Human Rights Day." They review the highlights of the Endowment's activities and operations in the past year.

For those of you who wish copies of the full report, copies are available from the National Endowment for Democracy, 1156 15th Street, Suite 304, Washington, DC, 20005.

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY

Before the end of this month, the National Endowment for Democracy will submit to the President its first Annual Report. We're proud of this report, for it demonstrates that in a short time, under circumstances that were often unusually trying, a sound foundation has been laid for the bipartisan effort to promote democracy which the President announced in his address to the British Parliament on June 8, 1982.

The objective of encouraging freedom and democracy in the world accords both with cherished American ideals and with the fundamental rights and principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The National Endowment for Democracy represents a further idea: namely, that the existence of autonomous economic, political, social and cultural institutions is the foundation of the democratic process which in turn is the best guarantor of individual rights and freedoms.

The Endowment is founded upon the belief that private institutions in free societies can contribute to the development of democracy through assistance to counterparts abroad.

The Endowment has now moved from the drawing board to the arena of practical programs and activities, and initial programs are underway. Overseeing this entire effort is a bipartisan Board of Directors which reflects the broad consensus that exists in America regarding the value of democracy and the need to strengthen it in the world.

This is not the place to summarize in detail the Endowment's first programs—we have done so in the Annual Report. But I think it would be worthwhile to touch briefly on a few of the high points which convey a sense of the Endowment's direction.

Efforts are underway through the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute to strengthen free and independent unions in all regions of the world, often in competition with efforts by anti-democratic groups to control and manipulate Third World workers' organizations. These efforts include assistance to Solidarity in Poland and to the emerging black unions in South Africa, to urban and rural workers in the Philippines, and to democratic workers' federations in Chile and Nicaragua.

At the same time, the National Chamber Foundation's Center for International Private Enterprise has initiated a broad program to strengthen the role of business associations abroad as advocates of democracy who have a special understanding of the relationship between an open political system and an open market economy. One of the Center's many projects is assistance to a pioneering effortin Peru to end the exclusion from the legal system of the sixty percent of the population that works in the informal economic sector. The program has far-reaching political significance in a country where the rallying cry of the terrorist organization, the Sendero Luminoso, is that the people can expect nothing from the law.

The institutes established by our two political parties, the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the National Republican Institute for International affairs, have also completed their first programs. An unprecedented gathering of party leaders from all regions of the world was sponsored last month by the Democratic Institute; and the Republican Institute encouraged broad participation in the recent elections in Grenada through nonpartisan programs to strengthen commitment to the democratic process.

The Endowment funds many programs in addition to those run by the labor, business and party institutes. At its last meeting, for example, the Board of the Endowment made an emergency grant that will keep alive the courageous Nicaraguan newspaper, La Prensa. Other programs include:

Assistance to independent educational and cultural activities in Poland and to the families of political prisoners, who urgently need medicine, food, and clothing;

Support for an independent, nonpartisan Center for Political Studies in Guatemala which is promoting dialogue, electoral and constitutional reform, and a new democratic consensus in that key Central American country;

Support for a Chinese journal promoting the values of intellectual pluralism among a key future leadership group, the 15,000 Chinese students and scholars now studying in the West;

Support for Conciencia, an Argentine women's organization which provides basic civics education to the public to help consolidate the new democracy in that country;

Funds to reopen and maintain schools in Afghanistan, which were closed following the Soviet invasion in 1979;

Support to Freedom House to strengthen contact and communication among democratic intellectuals in the Third World and Europe;

Support for the Fifty Sakharov Hearings on Human Rights and for a study exploring how the Endowment can encourage pluralism in the Soviet Union;

Support to Columbia University for an international exchange program in human rights law that will send American students abroad to work for law firms in such countries as South Africa, Zimbabwe, the Philippines and Argentina;

And support for the establishment of a European Coalition for Human Rights in Cuba, an effort led by Armando Valladares, the distinguished Cuban poet who spent 22 years in Castro's prisons.

For too long the United States has abandoned the field of political competition to our adversaries. Our democratic friends could expect little from us, and we in turn would express dismay over the weakness of democratic forces and the absence of a democratic alternative to communism.

We can change this. It will take time, effort, and resources, but it can be done. The fact that we have launched this effort is a signal to our democratic friends that we have a stake in their struggles and in their well-being, and that we share with them a profound common interest in the success of democracy in the world.

Over the long run democratic governments are both the most trustworthy defenders of human rights and the most reliable friends of the United States.

This is the work we have now begun. May we have the patience, the fortitude, and the wisdom to see it through.●

A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF MEALS ON WHEELS OF THE MONTEREY PENINSULA

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which was adopted by the House in the 98th Congress. This is a private bill that would relieve Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula of the FICA tax, plus interest and penalties, it owes for the years 1976 to 1982. This bill is vital to the continued effectiveness of this much-needed program.

This legislation is very important to the senior citizens of the Monterey, CA, area. Its enactment could ensure the ability of Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula to continue to provide home-delivered meals to shut-ins and elderly residents of the Monterey Peninsula. Failure to adopt it could effectively mean the end, or severe restriction, of that service.

Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula provides more than 100,000 meals annually to its recipients. It has been delivering three meals a day to shut-ins and elderly residents at home for 12 years. It has also developed a group meal program to permit the elderly to leave their homes and enjoy social contact. Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula, unlike many Meals on Wheels organizations, has a comprehensive health, nutritional, and social service approach which provides broad assistance to hundreds of elderly citizens. In my view, the loss of Meals on Wheels would be a real tragedy, particularly since the problem this bill addresses was caused by incorrect advice provided by an accountant.

To describe the problem briefly, an accountant working on a voluntary basis with the organization in 1975 incorrectly advised its leadership that, as a nonprofit organization, it was not required to pay the FICA tax on behalf of its employees and that the employees also were not required to pay the tax. In 1972, Meals on Wheels had begun to pay the FICA tax on behalf of some employees, although only one employee had actually wanted coverage. Under the law at that time, this obligated the organization to continue paying the tax. But the accountant, misinterpreting a confusing statute, mistakenly advised that there was no obligation and suggested that Meals on Wheels simply stop paying the tax. Regrettably, the organization took that advice, beginning in 1976.

The Internal Revenue Service has assessed Meals on Wheels on unpaid FICA tax from 1976 through 1980. In addition, there could be a liability for 1981 and 1982. The total owed right now, including interest and penalties, amounts to more than $50,000.

Since 1983, Meals on Wheels has been paying the FICA tax on behalf of its employees, as the law requires. This was, of course, a pragmatic decision to make under the circumstances. However, I believe it also shows good faith by Meals on Wheels. In addition, it brings the organization into line with the requirement established by the Social Security Amendments of 1983 that all nonprofit organizations participate in the Social Security system.

The bill I am introducing today is identical to H.R. 1561 from the 98th Congress. It provides that, with respect to services performed by its employees during the years 1976–82, Meals on Wheels and those employees are relieved of liability for the payment of unpaid FICA taxes and interest or penalties assessed or accrued on those taxes. Also, in order to ensure that individual employees are not harmed by this legislation, the bill provides that any work performed for Meals on Wheels during this period is credited to the Social Security accounts of the individual workers. The bill prevents the creation of a bureaucratic problem in the future by requiring that records of that employment be provided to the Secretary of Health and Human Services within a year of enactment of the bill. I have been assured by a representative of the Meals on Wheels organization that it can and will provide those records.

I do not subscribe to the argument that any taxpayer who receives incorrect tax advice should not be obligated to pay for mistakes based on that advice. However, this is a unique case. Meals on Wheels is known and respected nationwide. It is an important part of our Nation's efforts to provide the elderly with a means of remaining in their homes instead of being institutionalized. It not only adds incalculably to the quality of their daily lives but also reduces costs for the recipients and Government at all levels. For many recipients, the daily visit of a Meals on Wheels volunteer is the only contact they will have with the outside world. Without Meals on Wheels, it is certain that many of these elderly citizens would end up in costly nursing homes or other institutions.

Mr. Speaker, enactment of this legislation could mean the difference between a strong, thriving Meals on Wheels in the Monterey area and a weak organization that does not truly meet the needs of our citizens. I believe this outweighs any reservations that might be held about a measure of this kind. I certainly hope my colleagues will join me in support of this legislation.

Following is the text of this bill:

H.R. —

A bill for the relief of Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula, Incorporated

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula, Incorporated, and any individual who performed service in its employ after 1975 and before 1983 are relieved of all liability to the United States for the payment of unpaid taxes imposed by chapter 21 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (and any interest or penalty assessed or accrued on such taxes) with respect to service performed in the employ of Meals on Wheels of the Monterey Peninsula, Inc., during such period.

SEC. 2. For purposes of title II of the Social Security Act, service performed in the employ of Meals on Wheels of Monterey Peninsula, Incorporated, after 1975 and before 1983 shall be treated (for purposes of benefits for months beginning after the month in which this Act is enacted) as employment, if and to the extent that a detailed record of such service is transmitted to the Secretary of Health and Human Services within 12 months after the date of enactment of this Act.●

REFORM OF SOCIAL SECURITY-WORKERS' COMPENSATION OFFSET

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would change the order in which dependents' Social Security disability benefits are offset when the disabled wage-earner is receiving both Social Security disability benefits and workers' compensation benefits.

Under current law, if the Social Security disability benefits are subject to an offset because the disability recipient is also receiving State workers' compensation benefits, then the dependents' benefits are offset before the disabled wage-earner's benefits. This practice has little effect on the family's income when the entire family unit is living in the same household, but it can have devastating effects when the family is separated.

For example, one of my constituents was separated from her husband, but had custody of their child. The husband was entitled to both workers' compensation benefits and Social Security disability benefits. Because of the current offset procedures, she received only $5 per month in Social Security dependents' benefits for her child, while her husband received both workers' compensation benefits and disability benefits. In this example, as in many cases of this kind, the husband was not under court order to pay child support because his disabling condition precluded him from working.

My bill would simply reverse the order of the offset. In other words, the disabled wage-earner's disability benefits would be reduced before any of the dependents' benefits were reduced. This change would have no effect on households where the family is together, but it would significantly improve situations where the family is not all living under the same roof. The change that I have proposed is essential to insure that all beneficiaries receive the payments that they are due under the Social Security system, but the change would not increase Federal spending for the Social Security program.

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this important piece of legislation.●

TAX EQUITY AND SIMPLIFICATION ACT

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Tax Equity and Simplification Act of 1985, H.R. 1040, which I believe represents nothing less than a major step toward a tax system based upon the principles of fairness, efficiency, and simplicity.

The Tax Equity and Simplification Act contains nearly all of the Treasury Department's tax reform proposals as announced on November 27, 1983. The Reagan administration's Treasury Department is to be commended for proposing a tax reform package which provides real tax relief for 56 percent of all taxpayers and results in no increase in the tax burden for 22 percent more. At the same time, it removes 4 million working poor families from the tax rolls, and begins to redistribute the corporate and individual tax burden in a more equitable fashion. Furthermore, by eliminating the multiplicity of preferences, shelters, and loopholes, it eliminates current incentives to invest based upon tax rather than economic considerations.

For all too long, Government has pursued tax policies which have resulted in an overly complex system that allows the wealthy and special interests to avoid taxation at the average taxpayer's expense. These perceptions have translated into a growing lack of confidence in the equity of what was once a progressive tax system. The Treasury's proposal would change all this and thus warrants the support of the American people and their elected officials.

The proposal is not perfect and does contain some major inequities such as the elimination of the deduction for State and local taxes, the full taxation of unemployment benefits and workman's compensation benefits, the establishment of a cap on employer provided health care benefits, and the restriction on charitable deductions to contributions in excess of 2 percent of adjusted gross income. But on balance it does result in a system which taxes everyone on a more equal basis while at the same time reducing complexity. These are goals which are basic to a fair and equitable tax system.

INDIVIDUAL TAXES

The Treasury is to be commended for raising the income tax threshold to $11,800 for a family of four which means that families with incomes below poverty will not pay Federal income taxes. However, unlike the late 1970's, the earned income tax credit no longer offsets the impact of payroll taxes for families near poverty. This proposal takes an important step to reducing the tax burdens for poor families, but it does not go far enough. The earned income tax credit should be expanded to at least cover the cost of payroll taxes for those near the poverty line.

In return for the loss of tax loopholes, which predominately benefit the wealthy, the adoption of 15 percent, 25 percent, and 35 percent tax brackets will result in an average tax reduction of 8½ percent for 87 percent of all taxpayers and an increase for the remaining 22 percent who are now avoiding their fair share of the tax burden.

Notwithstanding my general support for this reform proposal, there are six provisions directly affecting individual taxpayers which I cannot support.

The elimination of the State and local tax deduction will have a severe impact on those State and local governments which, despite the Reagan budget cuts, have continued to provide needed services. As long as State and local governments are expected to assume responsibilities that were once Federal, it is unfair to penalize the taxpayers in those jurisdictions. The elimination of the deduction would result in a double taxation, that is, a tax on a tax.

The imposition of full Federal tax liability on unemployment insurance, which is currently exempt for the first $12,000 of income for individuals and for the first $18,000 for families, would place an undue burden on those who have already suffered the loss of their job. It is unjust to tax unemployment compensation, which is essentially an insurance policy, already paid for with after-tax dollars.

Similarly, and probably even more egregious, is the Treasury's proposal to tax workman's compensation, for unlike unemployment insurance, workman's compensation is provided not because you no longer are employed, but rather because job-related injuries make it impossible for you to work. These benefits are already purchased through after-tax payroll contributions and thus should remain tax exempt.

The establishment of a cap on employer provided health care benefits will have its severest impact on those individuals who live and work in communities where the cost of health care is significantly higher than the national average. While the alarming increase in the cost of health care must be checked, a more constructive approach would be the establishment of a comprehensive system of cost containment for all providers of health care services.

I would also eliminate the Treasury's proposal limiting deductions for charitable contributions in excess of 2 percent of adjusted gross income. If the responsibility for providing services is to be with the private sector, then the imposition of such a threshold can only serve to reduce charitable giving.

While I would allow the individual retirement account [IRA] to raise from the present $2,000 limit to $2,500, I would not expand the current spousal IRA from $250 to $2,500. This would simply allow the nonworking spouses of highly compensated individuals an unjustified tax shelter. Many economists believe that an expansion of the spousal IRA would not increase savings, but rather would merely result in a shifting of savings patterns.

CORPORATE TAXATION

For the past 33 years the percentage of Federal receipts from corporations has dropped from a high of 26.5 percent in 1950 to an all-time low of 6.2 percent in 1983. This drop in Federal corporate receipts has accelerated during the Reagan years, predominately due to the $750 billion, 1981 Reagan Economic Recovery Tax Act giveaways. Thus, I am more than pleased to support most of the Treasury's corporate tax proposals.

As with the reform proposal for individuals, the Treasury's reform proposals for corporations would exchange lower tax rates in return for the elimination of many of the least economically productive tax deductions. Thus, the top corporate tax rate would be reduced from 46 percent to 33 percent and at the same time stretch out overly generous accelerated cost recovery depreciation deductions for equipment, and eliminate a host of deductions and shelters including: The 10 percent investment tax credit, special treatment for capital gains, the sale of leases, the excess bad debt reserves of financial institutions, intangible drilling costs, the depletion allowance, special treatment for corporations in world trade, and deductions for entertainment expenses.

However, there are several changes in the Treasury corporate tax proposals which I would alter. Many small businesses currently pay less than the proposed 33-percent corporate tax rate. Therefore, I would substitute a progressive tax rate of 15 percent on the first $50,000 of taxable income, 25 percent on taxable income between $50,000 and $100,000, and 33 percent thereafter. The value of these reduced rates, designed to provide relief for small businesses, would be phased out between $100,000 and $200,000 of taxable corporate income.

In addition I would allow the research and development credit to expire.

My bill also differs from the Treasury package in another important respect. The Treasury package would allow a corporation to deduct from its taxable income 50 percent of any dividends in pays. My bill would not.

This part of the Treasury package would be a step toward integrating corporate and shareholder taxes. It is in part premised on the view that a corporation should not be treated as an entity separate from its shareholders but as an extension of its shareholders. I disagree with this view. Today's business world is heavily populated with corporations which are related to their shareholders only in the most formal of senses. It is, regrettably, a fact of life that in many of these cases, the corporation's managers are not the corporation's shareholders and are as a practical matter generally insulated from responsibility to shareholders in most corporate-level decisions they make. To treat these corporations and their shareholders largely as a single entity for tax purposes would be to ignore business reality.

My bill would direct the Treasury to submit to the Congress, within 90 days of enactment, recommendations to make my proposal revenue neutral and an implementing bill. However, nothing in the Tax Equity and Simplification Act of 1985 would take effect prior to the later of date of enactment or January 1, 1986.

By introducing the Treasury's tax reform proposals, I am seeking to provide a congressional forum on what constitutes an equitable, efficient, and simplified tax system. Only a thorough discussion of the tax system will allow us to determine what does and what doesn't belong in the tax code. Therefore, I would encourage people to come forward to make their case as to why a given tax expenditure should be maintained or eliminated.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. HOWARD INGHRAM

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Howard Inghram, a native of San Bernardino and a medical doctor for 50 years, was recently saluted in a special recognition dinner celebrating the 13th anniversary of the Black Voice News, an Inland Empire newspaper.

Dr. Inghram came from a family of seven; his father was a farmer. He grew up in San Bernardino and has seen it grow tremendously. He is a 1918 graduate of San Bernardino High School, where he was active on the track team and a star athlete. While in high school, Dr. Inghram had a serious talk with his oldest brother Henry about his future. It was then that they decided he would become a physician. Dr. Inghram attended the University of California at Berkeley for premed, and went on to Northwestern University in Chicago.

After his internship, Dr. Inghram returned to California. Facing racial discrimination, he opened a practice in relatively deserted Imperial Valley (near the Mexican border). Dr. Inghram taught himself to speak Spanish so he could better treat his patients.

In 1934, he began practicing medicine in San Bernardino; he was the only black doctor in San Bernardino County until after World War II. He delivered the first set of triplets at Community Hospital. He has practiced in all the hospitals in San Bernardino, treated all races of people, and, as a general practitioner with a specialty in obstetrics, he has delivered well over 1,000 babies. Dr. Inghram has brought several generations into the world. In his own words, "I've delivered mothers, and then delivered their daughters' babies." He has found the medical field a challenge where he has met new and different problems daily. Successfully diagnosing and treating patients brought him professional satisfaction.

In 1943, Dr. Inghram married Henrietta Banks, and she worked beside him as receptionist and bookkeeper for 29 years. They have one daughter, Shirley, four granddaughters, five great-grandsons, and one great-great-grandson.

He served 40 years in private practice and 10 years with Whitney Young Clinic and various other clinics as far away as Victorville, on the other side of the San Bernardino Mountains. Dr. Inghram has also served his country through ROTC and the Army Reserves, and his parents founded St. Paul African Methodist Church, where he remains a very active member. He has served as church trustee for over 45 years.

He has a lifetime membership in the American Medical Association and is a member of the Academy of General Practitioners, the NAACP and the Alpha Phi Fraternity.

He retired 7 years ago, and now enjoys his bowling, golf, and grandparenting.

I am pleased and happy to salute this pioneering doctor, Dr. Howard Inghram, along with the other black doctors who are providing quality health care in Riverside and San Bernardino. I believe my colleagues in the House will agree that he represents those qualities of service and distinction which merit his recognition here today.●

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, there is a resolution pending, which I have cosponsored, that will commemorate this month, February 1985, as Black History Month.

We have observed Black History Month in this Nation for the last few years, and I heartily endorse this form of commemoration.

This year, as we honor those black men and women who have played a significant role in our history, I want to bring to your attention a family who has, through their newspaper, had a tremendous positive impact in my district.

Twenty-six years ago, Vernon Mitchell opened the Columbus Times in Columbus, GA. He was a school teacher in Columbus and started the paper, he said, because he wanted to portray an accurate image of the activities and concerns of the black community.

He used his paper as a forum to promote black issues and to criticize community policies and programs that were unfair to blacks. Mitchell has been referred to as a "firebrand" by those who knew him, and his stirring journalism brought black issues and problems to the attention of the Columbus community.

But, in 1970, Vernon Mitchell died quite suddenly, and the future of the Columbus Times was left in the hands of his wife, Ophelia Devore Mitchell. With the encouragement of the people who worked at the paper, Ms. Mitchell decided to keep the paper open.

When the presses began to roll at Ophelia Mitchell's paper, however, they carried a new message to the people of Columbus. Mrs. Mitchell wanted to show through her paper the positive and productive aspects of the black community. Her paper would be used, she said, to report the achievements and successes of black people. The Columbus Times became a paper that took up only issues important to the black community at large—a paper which would not be the voice for personal grievances.

At a time when blacks appeared primarily in the media in reports of crime or injury, Mrs. Mitchell's paper highlighted the examples of excellence and achievement among blacks in Columbus and the South.

Her paper became a reflection of her own personal philosophy—a philosophy which refused to use the power of the press to hurt a particular person and a philosophy which said that all people, black or white, rich or poor, are equal and should be treated with respect.

In 1973, at Mrs. Mitchell's request, her daughter and son-in-law joined her at the paper. Carol and Helmut Gerdes took up Mrs. Mitchell's philosophy and they still serve in prominent positions at the paper today. Carol Gerdes holds the position of news editor and advertising manager, and Helmut is the managing editor of the Columbus Times.

They have added some special features to the paper over the years, which reflect their own desire to highlight the achievements of blacks. Twice a year, they print a special black study series that spotlights a black person or program that has made the city or region a better place to live. They also print black history pages on a regular basis, to spotlight outstanding people and events that have influenced American history.

Throughout all these years, the Columbus Times has added to the Columbus community. The paper has been instrumental in establishing the harmony and respect which typifies relations among all segments of Columbus society. Thanks to the people behind the Columbus Times, the paper has influenced the city and its people, and made "good news" something people want to talk and read about.

Every issue of the Columbus Times carries this headline: "Recording Black History Every Day". In this Black History Month, I want to pay tribute to this paper and the people who create it for recording positive and uplifting events in Columbus, and for helping to spread the philosophy of Ophelia Devore Mitchell throughout our area.●

THE 1984 STEINERT VARSITY BOYS SOCCER TEAM—STATE CHAMPIONS

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join with me in recognizing and congratulating the accomplishments of the Steinert (Hamilton High School—East) boys' varsity soccer team. Culminating an excellent season, they became the group III New Jersey State champions by winning the final match 3 to 0 in Rutgers' Stadium on November 23, 1984.

Only allowing 15 goals all season, the Steinert boys' varsity soccer team held their opponents scoreless in 16 out of the 25 games they played—that is a 22-2-1 season record with their only 2 losses coming from a team that went on to win the State title for parochial schools. The team's consistently outstanding performance regularly attracted thousands of enthusiastic supporters, too.

Hamilton Township is rightfully proud, Mr. Speaker, since this type of achievement has become a tradition for their soccer team. For the last 10 years, the team has been ranked among the top 10 in our State. This year, Peter Kasabach made the All East Coast team, while Dan Donigan was awarded with All America honors. But over the course of the season, Mr. Speaker, the entire team consistently demonstrated that by working together, great things can be accomplished.

The coaching staff also deserves high honors for the development of a program that provides youths with the opportunity to be a part of this unique winning experience. Winning the New Jersey State title requires a special contribution from talented athletes, experienced coaches, supportive administrators, and enthusiastic fans alike. The State title is a just reward for the years of practice, patience, and hard work involved in building a sports program of this depth, capable of these achievements.

This team also provides us with a stellar example of the benefits of participation in high school sports. The teamwork and comaraderie instilled in the players will remain with them for the rest of their lives.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, not every team can hope to be as successful as the Steinert boys' varsity soccer team. These values that participation in high school sports teaches, however, are common to all team sports.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the players and their coaches—whose names are listed below—on an outstanding season. Finally, I wish them luck in the competition next year.

1984 STEINERT VARSITY BOYS SOCCER TEAM—STATE CHAMPIONS

Kenneth Blando, Kirk Bullock, Jerry Chmielewski, Nicholas Christiano, Scott Cook, Joe DiMeglio, Dan Donigan, Kenneth Durfee, Raymond Fowler, Andrew Grzenda, Gordon (Chip) Hector, William Hornung, Peter Kasabach, Francis (Craig) Klein, Kevin Klopper, James Kucay, Brian Matson, Brian McVicker, Mark Nouvel, Robert Stefanowicz, and Mark Zoldi.

NATIONAL SCLERODERMA WEEK

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a joint resolution today designating the week of June 10-16, 1985, as "National Scleroderma Week." Similar resolutions were adopted in 1982 and 1983, and it is my hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting the resolution this year as well.

Scleroderma, for those of my colleagues who are not familiar with this disease, is a painful and debilitating ailment that attacks the skin and multiple organs of the body. In its most serious form, scleroderma can strike the esophagus, intestines, lungs, heart, or kidneys, causing fibrosis, inflammation, and atrophy of normal functioning tissues. Two major problems caused by scleroderma are decreased circulation and increased production of collagen. Localized scleroderma causes hardening and thickening of the skin, particularly of the hands and fingers, along with painful ulcerations.

This disease, one of the many forms of arthritis, affects an estimated 300,000 people in the United States. However, the actual number of victims may be higher because of misdiagnosed cases. Four times as many women as men develop scleroderma in early and middle age.

Unfortunately, the cause of scleroderma is unknown, and there is no permanent cure for the disease. While there is no specific treatment for scleroderma, various medications and therapies can alleviate symptoms. But research is being conducted at medical centers throughout the United States in search of a cure.

Lack of focus on this disease has resulted in a shortage of funding for this vital research. At a time when public funding for many worthy causes is scarce, we obviously need to encourage private contributions. National Scleroderma Week will help to bring the additional attention that will boost public consciousness of scleroderma, as well as lend comfort to its hundreds of thousands of victims.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this important resolution.●

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION ON CORPORATE ACQUISITIONS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with Congressmen BROOKS, EDWARDS of California, SEIBERLING, HUGHES, and FEIGHAN in introducing two bills that will adjust the application of our antitrust laws to corporate acquisitions. The bills are in response to a significantly changed enforcement climate during the past 4 years in which large horizontal mergers have rarely been blocked and vertical and conglomerate combinations have been subject to no appreciable antitrust restraint whatsoever.

Not only does the current passivity of the antitrust agencies toward merger enforcement come at the consumer's expense, but it also ignores or overrides those policy goals specifically endorsed by Congress in passing the antitrust laws: assuring competition at all levels of the distribution chain; assuring that any efficiency savings will be passed on to the consumer; and assuring a place for the innovative small business competitor. The two bills I have introduced are aimed at reendorsing these goals and, by so doing, revitalizing merger enforcement policy.

On Tuesday of this week, the President released his annual Economic Report. The report concedes that many takeovers appear to have been misguided; we are told, however, that these acquisitions are, on balance, good for the country. But that which is good for the country depends upon both the workings of the free market and the public confidence underpinning that system. Because that antitrust laws were developed as a unique guarantor of the American free market system, any policy which has the effect of reducing the reach and force of those laws will inevitably threaten the workings of the system and shake the confidence of the American public.

And public confidence is now being sorely tested. The spectacle of large Fortune 500 companies attacking each other, counterattacking and maneuvering as if involved in war games demonstrates, in most dramatic fashion, that these corporate battles clearly affect large segments of society and have substantial potential for harm. Congress, consistent with its constitutional responsibilities, cannot ignore the issue on the easy assurance of some that the short-term devastation will somehow be cleaned up.

The bills that we introduce today build upon the legislative proposals that were advanced by me, by Congressman SEIBERLING, and by other members of the subcommittee during the 98th Congress. There is widespread congressional interest in corporate acquisition activity because of the problems created by an altered enforcement climate.

The amendment to section 7 of the Clayton Act will adjust merger enforcement standards to ensure that the courts will properly weigh the effects of potential as well as actual competition. In passing the amended section 7 of the Clayton Act, Congress was concerned that a competitive analysis of a merger take into account not only direct market rivals, but also potential competitors in closely proximate or adjacent product or geographic markets who might, under the guise of a conglomerate merger, achieve undue dominance in a particular market. In recent years, however, the enforcement agencies and the courts have largely ignored this important factor.

In addition, the section 7 amendment would establish a presumption of an anticompetitive effect for certain acquisitions that may substantially foreclose a competitor's access to supplies or to customers. These are significant considerations in vertical combinations, and have long been a part of antitrust jurisprudence. But here again, the enforcement agencies have largely discounted or ignored their critical role in a balanced merger-enforcement policy.

The second bill is an amendment to the premerger notification program established by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. The bill would end the unwarranted favored status of cash tender offers under section 7A of the Clayton Act by establishing a uniform 30-day waiting period for all types of acquisitions. A major concern with some cash tender offers has been the inadequate time available to respond to offers that will affect the lives and fortunes of thousands of employees and, in some cases, entire communities. A uniform 30-day period will permit more measured and rational public responses to takeover attempts.

This bill would also permit the Department of Justice or the Federal Trade Commission to extend the waiting period for up to 60 additional days if the combined corporate assets of the acquisition parties will exceed $1 billion. This additional review period is needed in order to provide the enforcement agencies adequate time to scrutinize all potential anticompetitive effects of acquisitions involving very large acquisitions.

Of course, these legislative proposals will not by themselves establish an orderly marketplace for the buying and selling of corporate control of publicly traded corporations. Even with the active enforcement of the antitrust laws, other reforms are clearly indicated. No system of corporate control serves this Nation well if the managers of our largest industrial enterprises are so consumed with the gamesmanship of takeover tactics that they are unable to manage a corporation's productive capacities. Consumers, employees, and stockholders are all best served if the management is able to focus on its primary task: Maximizing a firm's economic potential through innovation and investment in areas in which the firm has expertise. And there are, increasingly, clear and present signals that managements are not able to function properly. Among them is the increasing number of managements of publicly traded companies that are choosing to go private. Plagued by increasing concerns with hostile takeover activity, many managements are buying out all publicly held shares. W.T. Grimm data suggest that in the first 9 months of 1984, 53 corporations chose to go private, a startling figure when compared to 1980, when only 13 corporations took such action.

Still another sign of malaise is the increasing number of companies that are amending their bylaws in an attempt to ward off hostile takeovers offers. Both General Motors and Mobil, the No. 2 and 3 ranked companies on the Fortune 500 list of industrial firms, have sought such bylaw revisions in the last few months. And the New York Stock Exchange is under pressure from listed companies to consider rule changes that might limit stockholder control over management's decisions.

These actions suggest that corporate management, increasingly concerned with the impact of hostile takeover activity, has sought to act on its own to deal with the chaotic market conditions now confronting them. Whether or not successful, such responses have their own costs—and they are likely to be substantial. If the responsive actions of corporate management are unsuccessful in blocking takeovers, the pressures on managers to look only to the short term will continue. And, whether or not successful, many of these defensive tactics will undermine other public policy objectives, including the goal of maintaining ultimate stockholder control of publicly traded corporations.

Everyone of us has a fundamental interest in seeing our industrial economy function well. It if does not, consumers ultimately must pay the bill through higher prices, fewer varied and quality products, and a lower standard of living.

Joined by my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, I intend to move forward in the 99th Congress on that part of the takeover problem that may be controlled or eliminated through vigilant antitrust enforcement.●

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues today as an original cosponsor of a bill to proclaim March 20, 1985, as "National Agriculture Day." National Agriculture Day has been observed for more than a decade and each year since 1981 has been recognized by an act of Congress. I urge that this tradition be continued so that every American becomes aware of the importance of agriculture.

My family comes from a Michigan farm. Memories of that place mean a lot to me. For that reason, farming holds a very special place in my heart.

America's character is embodied in her farmers. This group of Americans possess and illustrate so well the fundamental qualities that make our Nation so strong. Those qualities are: independence, diligence, and patriotism.

American farmer's unquenchable thirst for independence shows us that in America we are, above all else, free. These indomitable people show us year after year that, despite being used time after time as unwilling pawns in the chess game of foreign policy and despite suffering debilitating losses as a result of mistakes in that foreign policy, our farmers continue to be the most productive and advanced group of agriculturalists in the world.

Our farmers' diligence is reflected in their countless hours of work devoted to raising this country's food supply. During planting and harvesting seasons they work literally from before dawn to long after nightfall—missing meals, sleep, and time with their families to get the crop cared for, out of the ground and in—so that people who don't farm can enjoy the benefits of the miracles they have come to take for granted at their local supermarket.

Beyond the farmers' independence and diligence is their deep-rooted patriotism, which is expressed through careful husbandry of America's precious resources. Our farmers show with actions that which words cannot adequately express: a boundless love and respect for this land. Farmers know the infinite and subtle personalities of the land in which they are firmly rooted. That land has bred this group of fine Americans. We could not ask for a more patriotic group of people than America's farmers.

These contributions underscore the importance of recognizing their magnificent achievements through National Agriculture Day on March 20, 1985. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring and passing the resolution proclaiming National Agriculture Day recognizing America's farmers.●

THE SOVIETS AND THE ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT ON THE POPE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am troubled by recent findings suggesting that the Soviets may have been responsible for the attempted assassination of the Pope in Rome. While the Soviet intelligence service has always been suspect in this attempt, this new information sheds more light on their possible involvement in this heinous deed. The following article presents interesting details about what the Soviet military intelligence service, the GRU, and the former Soviet Defense Minister were planning for His Holiness.

In general, there is strong evidence regarding Soviet involvement in supporting international terrorism. The Soviets provide assistance to countries like Libya, Syria, North Korea, some Eastern European states, and others which use terrorism as an instrument of state. Although it is difficult for many of us in the democratic West to believe that some national governments directly use acts of terrorism to pursue their national policy, there is abundant intelligence to prove this point.

While I fervently hope that arms-control talks with the Soviet Union bear fruit, I remain concerned that a country which backs, at a distance, international terrorism might be willing to violate solemn international arms-control accords. While our Government representatives sit across the negotiating table from Soviet negotiators, we must always remember that behind our back the Kremlin indirectly supports terrorism attacks against U.S. interests around the world.

I strongly support the administration's current efforts to enhance the security of our diplomatic facilities overseas and strengthen our intelligence collecting abilities. The fight against terrorism by the West is a long and hard struggle which we must win if we are to remain free societies.

With these thoughts in mind, I recommend this article to my colleagues in the Congress.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Times, Jan. 31, 1985]

ITALIAN AGENTS TIE SOVIETS TO PAPAL SHOOTING

ROME.—Italy's military secret services reported six days after Pope John Paul II was wounded in 1981 that Soviet military intelligence was behind the shooting in St. Peter's Square, the magazine L'Europeo said yesterday.

The weekly said a May 19, 1981, classified report by the secret services concluded that Dmitri Ustinov, the late Soviet defense minister, was the head of the conspiracy against the Polish-born pontiff.

L'Europeo did not say how it obtained access to the secret document, but the Italian news agency ANSA quoted "competent sources" as confirming the existence of the document.

L'Europeo said the document cited John Paul's support of Solidarity, the outlawed Polish trade union, as the main reason for the conspiracy.

The document quoted "generally well-informed sources" as saying the plot was discussed at a meeting of the defense ministers of the Warsaw Pact, held in Bucharest in November 1980, L'Europeo said.

"The decisions were greeted with enthusiasm only by representatives of East Germany," L'Europeo quoted the report as saying.

"In view of the perplexity expressed by the other [Warsaw Pact] allies, Ustinov reportedly said that the pope would only be wounded so he would not be a bother for a good while," it said.

"According to intelligence data, the attempt against John Paul was planned by the GRU, the Soviet Union's military secret service, on Ustinov's directives," L'Europeo said.

It added that the Soviet agency helped Mehmet Ali Agca—who was arrested moments after shooting the pope and is serving a life prison sentence—to escape from a Turkish prison and then trained him.●

LET'S ADD AN EDUCATION COMPONENT TO THE SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to add an education component to the Summer Youth Employment Program of the Job Training Partnership Act. In expanding the existing summer youth employment program, this bill will:

First, provide youth with basic academic and functional competencies;

Second, provide counseling on the connection between skills and job prospects;

Third, involve those who are behind in school in combined work experience and remedial education activities;

Fourth, develop individual remedial strategies for each young person to pursue during the school year; and

Fifth, add a 90-percent hold-harmless provision to insure against drastic shifts in allocations.

This legislation requires no additional Federal dollars and is revenue neutral, since it requires (after a 2-year phase-in period) that each private industry council [PIC] raise a limited amount of non-Federal funds (1.5 percent of the SYEP allocation) to pay for this effort. These locally raised funds would then be matched by the State from non-Federal sources or from existing Federal funds available to the State under section 202(b) (1) and (3) of JTPA and under chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981.

This legislation was developed in response to research findings that:

First, economically disadvantaged youth are likely to experience decay in their achievement scores during the summer;

Second, a significant portion of the difference in learning from year to year between disadvantaged and advantaged youth may occur during the summer;

Third, disadvantaged youth who are behind one grade level or more in school are at-risk of dropping out of school;

Fourth, individualized, self-paced remedial instruction is effective and the preferred approach in reversing these trends with economically disadvantaged youth, and can produce modest and lasting gains in basic academic and functional competency skills; and

Fifth, when achievement scores can be raised during the summer, especially for youth aged 14-15, high school dropout rates may be reduced.

Further refinements to this legislation were made after receiving comments from the National Governors' Association, the American Vocational Association, the Ford Foundation, the National Association of Counties, the National Association of Private Industry Councils, 70,001 Ltd., the National Alliance of Business, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the Roosevelt Centennial Youth Project, as well as a number of JTPA directors.

H.R. 1090

A bill to amend part B of title II of the Job Training Partnership Act to require the establishment of an education component in the summer youth employment programs under that part

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to recognize a truly fine American and a great Kansan, Ivy Bond. Ivy will celebrate his 79th birthday on February 22, and is being honored at the First National Bank of Shawnee Mission on that day.

Ivy was born in Eldon, MO, on February 22, 1906. He came to Kansas City in 1925 and was employed at Swift & Co. for 42 years until his retirement in 1968. During his service at Swift & Co., he held positions as State director of the Kansas Credit Union League; national director of the Credit Union National Association; chairman of the legislative committee of both the State and National Credit Union; national treasurer of the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers.

Upon his retirement from Swift, he was named president of the Overland Park Credit Union and served for 4 years. In 1972, the First National Bank of Shawnee Mission was chartered in Fairway, KS, and Ivy Bond was the first employee and named vice president.

He is past president of the Milhaven Homes Association and has served as trustee, finance committee and usher at Prairie Baptist Church. He has served on numerous Republican campaign committees in Johnson County and has been active in the mission and Overland Park Chambers of Commerce and is a former member of Rotary International.

Ivy Bond is a fine example of what hard work and dedication can produce. I wish to extend to him a hearty "happy birthday" and all the best for years to come.●

DRAFT REGISTRATION AND CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, the current draft registration program has been in effect since 1980. Since its revival, the registration program has raised a number of troubling issues, including the denial of student aid for nonregistrants.

Of those problems, none is more troubling than the impact of the draft registration requirement on individuals who are conscientiously opposed to participating in war in any form, and whose beliefs therefore preclude them from registering for the draft.

Currently a person convicted of nonregistration could receive a 5-year jail sentence and a $10,000 fine. During initial debate on the registration program in 1980, those of us who opposed the program warned that its revival could put the United States in the unfortunate position of prosecuting tens of thousands of nonregistrants, some of whom would refuse to register on conscientious grounds. It is singularly unfortunate that the registration requirement has the potential of making criminals out of young men simply because their religious beliefs prevent them from complying with the law. The current law draws absolutely no distinction between those who deliberately refuse to register because of political or personal reasons, and those who do not register because it would run counter to their religious beliefs.

Part of the problem might be solved if there was some way to register as a conscientious objector. Conscientious objection is, however, a term of classification used in the past military draft system. Draft registration, however, is not a classification and induction system. As a consequence, conscientious objectors have two choices: Either participate in a system which does not even allow them to register their basic beliefs, or face a jail term and fine. Under the current law, religious or ethical belief is simply not a defense for nonregistration.

I find it curious and troubling that while the Congress has acted with great speed to deny Federal student loans to nonregistrants, we cannot bring ourselves to address the basic issue of religious freedom and its apparently unavoidable conflict with the registration requirement. The simplest solution is to amend the Military and Selective Service Act to specifically exempt individuals who are conscientiously opposed to participation in preparation for war in any form.

Accordingly, I am today reintroducing legislation I first introduced in the 98th Congress to provide such an exemption. The exemption would be suspended during a period of national mobilization, since mobilization would result in a resumption of the classification and induction system, allowing conscientious objectors to seek such status. The bill I am introducing would also permit the courts to vacate a judgment of conviction where justice requires such action.

Mr. Speaker, my bill offers a direct, simple, and timely remedy to a complicated problem. It deserves the support of all Members, regardless of their views about the need for registration itself. I urge its prompt consideration.●

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINE INDEPENDENCE

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1985, marked the 67th anniversary of Ukraine's independence, Mr. Speaker, and I think that it is fitting that the House take a moment to reflect upon the courage and determination the Ukrainian people have demonstrated.

Ukraine, with a population of over 50 million, was the first victim of Soviet aggression. It is the largest non-Russian nation within the Soviet Union and ranks in Europe next to Russia, Germany, and France not only in terms of population, but also in terms of strategic geographic position and rich resources.

In 1917, when the far-flung Russian Empire met its inevitable doom, the Ukrainian people were the first to take on a national character. They established a Central Council in Kiev, which became the center of the Ukrainian liberation movement. The Central Council organized the Ukrainian National Army, established Ukrainian schools, introduced Ukrainian administrative and judicial systems, and prepared a Ukrainian Constituent Assembly. By these actions Ukraine established a full-fledged independent state: the Ukrainian National Republic.

At the same time, the Russian Communist Party issued its declaration in favor of the right to self-determination. It soon became apparent, however, that the new Soviet Government intended to reclaim the former Russian Empire. Simultaneously with the ostentatious proclamation of the right to self-rule, the Soviet Russian Government dispatched to the Ukrainian National Government a 48-hour ultimatum. Dated December 17, 1917, and signed by Lenin and Stalin, this document demanded unconditional surrender and the acceptance of Soviet Russian domination over Ukraine.

The reply by the Ukrainian Government of December 19, 1917, is regarded today as a historical and classical document which demonstrates a remarkable perception of the potential Communist threat not only to the young Ukrainian Republic, but to free people throughout the world. From the beginning the Ukrainians realized that there was little or no difference between czarist and Bolshevik imperialism.

Ukraine rejected the Soviet ultimatum by proclaiming her independence on January 22, 1918. One year later, on January 22, 1919, Ukraine issued a second proclamation which called for the reunification of all Ukrainian territories into one democratic state. With these signifcant acts, the Ukrainian nation demonstrated to the world that Moscow and Kiev represented two different nations, and two different mentalities. Kiev personified the democratic concept of govenment based on respect for human rights and the dignity of man, while Moscow represented totalitarianism.

Heroically, the Ukrainian nation endured 3 years before succumbing to the numberically superior military force of Communist Russia. In 1921, the Communist regime destroyed the Ukrainian national state and replaced it with a puppet government with the name of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Since then, the Ukrainain people have persevered through political and cultural repression, economic exploitation, and all-encompassing Russification. Both the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic churches have been systematically destroyed. In an enforced collectivization of Ukraine's agriculture in 1932-33, some 7 to 10 million Ukrainians were starved to death by the government sponsored famine. During and after World War II, hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians were deported, exiled, and murdered for their support of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army [UPA] and the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists [OUN], both of which fought against the Nazis and then the Soviet occupation of Ukraine.

Yet despite the endless suffering and persecution endured by the Ukrainian people, the true ideal of Ukrainian independence continues to live on in the hearts and minds of the Ukrainian people in their homeland and indeed, throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian nation and its people have fought for freedom not only literally, against the armed military might of the Kremlin, but also spiritually and morally in ways that have touched the lives of freedom-loving people everywhere. Indeed, they continue to nurture freedom for all of us by cherishing their own heritage, language, customs, religion, and other cultural riches as expressed in art, music, and dance.

By their heroism, Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people have taught us a valuable lesson: For just as we rejoice in Thomas Jefferson's proud sentiment, "where freedom is, there is my country," so also do we have a sacred responsibility to act upon Thomas Paine's magnificent reply: "where freedom is not, there is my country."●

REPEAL CONTEMPORANEOUS ACCOUNTING

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, the farmers and businessmen of Michigan's 10th District are angry, and I can't blame them. The Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 now requires users of business vehicles to document every mile they drive. This "contemporaneous accounting rule" is oppressive, bureaucratic, and counterproductive. One of my constitutents, who runs a plumbing operation, tells me that his crews can no longer respond to emergencies as quickly as they once did, because they can't take their trucks home at night. An accountant called me and said, "I just wanted you to know that since they put in this new law, I've decided to send all my kids to accounting school. There should be tons of paper blowing around for years to come." Finally, a farmer friend of mine, who has a commendable sense of humor under the circumstances, said to me, "Can't the Government figure out a better way to make us cheat?"

In short, Mr. Speaker, the contemporaneous accounting rule is a bad law. It exacts an intolerable burden on the citizenry: A burden which interferes with their daily and commercial lives, represents a futile effort to punish a dishonest few by penalizing the honest majority, and further erodes the credibility of our tax system and the authority of the Federal Government.

I realize that the IRS has just released modifications in this rule that are supposed to reduce the paperwork, but they are not acceptable to the people of the 10th District, and they are not acceptable to me. We must repeal this pointless and intolerable intrusion into our daily lives.●

LEGISLATION TO REDUCE THE TRIGGER FOR SOCIAL SECURITY COLA'S

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, our Nation's poor, elderly, and disabled citizens are coming to expect that each new budget cycle will bring with it a new assault on the Social Security Program. This year, the 36 million Americans who rely on this program are faced with increasing speculation that the Social Security COLA will be delayed, an action that would thrust more than 500,000 additional seniors into the clutches of poverty. This would come on top of drastic benefit reductions in 1981 and 1983 that grievously harmed many beneficiaries and shattered the confidence of young and old alike in the future of the Social Security System.

It is now far past the time when this kind of speculation should have been brought to an end by the Congress and the President. If we are to preserve the Social Security System for the future, we must make a firm and lasting commitment to adequate benefit levels for all Social Security beneficiaries. It is essential, both for the sake of current Social Security beneficiaries who rely on the program for their survival, and for the sake of the long-term future of Social Security as a whole, that we firmly and unequivocally disavow any proposals for further damaging cuts in this essential program. We cannot in good conscience thrust more and more of our elderly citizens into poverty while seriously endangering the national treasure that is Social Security.

A meaningful commitment to the future of the Social Security System means placing this program firmly off limits to those who are seeking to balance the Federal budget on the backs of the elderly. It also means that benefit levels must be kept firmly in line with rising prices.

Unfortunately, there remains a provision of the Social Security law that could result in a temporary benefit reduction for Social Security recipients in the coming years. Under current law, Social Security beneficiaries are entitled to a COLA only when inflation exceeds a 3 percent "trigger" threshold. This means that, if inflation drops below 3 percent, recipients will be subject to a small, but nevertheless important, reduction in buying power over the period in which the COLA is foregone.

It is true that the benefits foregone in such an instance will be compensated for in later years, when the CPI once again rises above the 3-percent level. However, postponing the COLA for 1 or more years will place an additional strain on Social Security recipients, who have already been burdened by repeated cutbacks in recent years.

For this reason, I have introduced legislation to reduce the 3-percent trigger for Social Security COLA's to 1 percent. Under my bill, COLA's for Social Security will be more strictly indexed to the inflation rate. Whenever inflation is occurring at a rate of 1 percent or more and the buying power of the dollar is dropping, Social Security benefits will be raised by a commensurate amount. This is a simple matter of fairness for Social Security beneficiaries, many of whom are already struggling to make ends meet.

Of the major Federal programs that are indexed to the Consumer Price Index [CPI], many—including military and civil service retirement benefits—contain no trigger provision at all. By retaining a trigger level of 1 percent, my bill recognizes that the administrative costs associated with enacting a very small COLA may outweigh the benefits to recipients. My bill responds to the concerns of the American people, who have repeatedly expressed their belief that Social Security benefits should be maintained at all costs. But it does so in a responsible fashion, by remaining sensitive to the problem of Government waste.

Not only will this bill protect Social Security beneficiaries against a needless reduction in buying power, but it will also help eliminate much of the political game-playing that has surrounded the COLA issue in recent months.

In July 1984, President Reagan announced that inflation might drop below the 3-percent level and that special legislation might be required to ensure a cost of living adjustment for 1985. However, this announcement came a full 3 months before reliable price data were to become available. It was not difficult to discern that the announcement had been motivated by the upcoming Presidential election and not by a newfound interest in preserving the Social Security System.

Because the President's announcement served to create significant fears among older Americans that another benefit cut was on the way, the Congress responded by passing legislation to guarantee a COLA for 1985 regardless of the inflation rate. However, it soon became clear that the legislation had been entirely unnecessary. When the final price statistics were released, they showed that inflation was well above the 3-percent trigger level.

The 3-percent trigger provision provided the President with the opportunity to prop up his political status with older Americans just prior to an important national election. It was a cynical and highly hypocritical action for a President who has attacked Social Security throughout his career in public life and has done more to endanger the future of this program than any other public figure.

My bill would prevent this kind of base political posturing from being repeated. Under my legislation, COLA's would be made available to Social Security beneficiaries whenever inflation exceeds 1 percent. There would be no need to enact special legislation to ensure a COLA, and there would be no opportunity to make political gains by calling for such legislation when it is completely unnecessary.

Because of the damage that has already been done to the Social Security Program, those of us in the Congress must be especially vigilant in our defense of Social Security in the coming years. I believe that reducing the 3-percent trigger for Social Security COLA's is an important element in that defense. I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to ensure simple fairness for beneficiaries and to eliminate the potential for senseless posturing on the COLA issue.

A copy of this legislation follows:

LEGISLATION TO ASSURE THE CONTINUATION OF THE FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, 1 week ago today, as I introduced much-needed legislation to assure the continuation of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program beyond its scheduled expiration next month, I said that a complete reform of the Federal-State extended compensation system should be a primary goal of this Congress. Today, I am pleased to introduce a bill which would make long-overdue reforms by combining the current Extended Benefits Program with the FSC Program to form a streamlined program of extended compensation for the long-term unemployed.

I believe there is an urgent need for a single permanent program of extended unemployment compensation. One set of criteria would make the unemployment system easier and simpler to implement and understand for both its administrators and its recipients. The current system, with its confusing triggers and varying durations of benefit periods, has caused unnecessary anxiety and frustration for the unemployed. It is no better for State officials who have had to adapt their own UI systems to continual changes. They have rightly called the current system an administrative nightmare.

Now is a particularly good time to make the kind of major changes that are so necessary in this area of the law. With unemployment not at a crisis level, we should take advantage of the opportunity to make the kind of thorough and thoughtful revision of the extended compensation system which will leave us with a flexible and responsive program in place for whatever the future might hold.

This bill would provide a single extended compensation program which would provide the most weeks of benefits to the States with the highest levels of unemployment. It would require a sliding scale of Federal financial participation in the program, in recognition of the fact that unusually high unemployment can result from national—or even international—events. It would also provide a way to use a State's total unemployment rate [TUR] as a triggering device, instead of the situation we have under current law, where only the insured unemployment rate [IUR] can trigger benefits beyond the basic programs operated by the States. Because the IUR does not count either those workers who are receiving extended compensation or those who have exhausted their UI benefits, it cannot help being an inefficient indicator of which States suffer the most from long-term unemployment.

I am convinced that these kinds of reforms in our unemployment compensation system are both necessary and possible in this Congress. I urge you to join with me and my cosponsors—Mr. CLINGER, Mr. STARK, Ms. KAPTUR, and Mr. BOEHLERT—in this effort to simplify and improve the unemployment compensation system at the Federal level, for the benefit of the States and for its beneficiaries—the American people at large.●

THE PRIVATE SECTOR ROLE IN ALLEVIATING HUNGER

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 7, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. FASCELL] and the distinguished ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] a House concurrent resolution encouraging private sector involvement in the worldwide effort to alleviate hunger.

Until recently, neither corporations nor developing countries recognized the very significant role for foreign private investment in direct efforts to alleviate hunger and malnutrition.

Most U.S. corporations have not had the opportunity nor have they been called upon to apply their research and development efforts to resolve the needs of malnourished populations. For example, food processors, traditionally, have targeted groups other than the poor. The techniques in which they excell—product differentiation, mass marketing to middle- and upper-income groups—historically have not met the needs of malnourished people in very poor countries.

It is possible, however, to meet the challenge of investing in developing countries and in that process to target, directly or indirectly, some of this investment to the hungry. Many agribusiness firms have been highly successful in combining social considerations with the need to achieve an adequate return on investmest.

For example, the Presidential Commission on World Hunger cites the case of one firm that not only raised the incomes of small farmers in a heavily populated region in Kenya but also reduced that country's dependence on sugar imports in the process. Instead of organizing sugar production on the traditional plantation basis, the firm works with farmer-supplier—4-acre farm size—and had set aside land for food production. In addition to the 5,000 farmers, the refinery employs 2,500 local workers who are gradually replacing the foreigners hired to supervise them. The success of this venture has led to additional management contracts for similar projects.

Thus there exists a possibility for a good working relationship between imported technology and local need. This kind of an initiative prevented the development of a ghetto colony of landless laborers and other social problems which have often attended this type of enterprise in the past. Unless such challenges are accepted, corporate investment is likely to occur slowly in countries where hunger is a major problem. However, past experience indicates that conditions in some countries can change rapidly and in the interim there are ways other than equity investment whereby American management skills can be made available on a mutually agreeable basis. Through continued innovative approaches on the part of the private sector enhanced by public sector support the benefits of foreign investment will be further realized at the village level.

Many international corporations are diligently working and in such instances they are to be commended and encouraged, to understand the problems of rural development and to tailor their expertise to the specific problems of each developing country. The technology of corporations—efficient productions systems, food processing and preservation techniques, advanced research, management and organizational skills—must continue to be adapted in ways that are socially and culturally acceptable, economically viable, and increasingly beneficial for the poor majority.

The Congress can help this process along by further developing practical modes of business-Government cooperation. A long-term focus in U.S. assistance programs, increased use of resources to achieve policy changes required for increased trade and investment and efficient operation of market forces will be on our agenda for the 99th Congress. It has become increasingly obvious to many of our colleagues on the Hill that while the success of our Nation is based upon private enterprise, we do far too little to build up the capacity of developing countries to attract trade and investment. To a great degree our foreign aid programs are predicated on transferring money and goods rather than the know-how—the critical transfer and dissemination of technology to enchance production, distribution, and marketing—which will, in turn, attract investment and trade.

This resolution puts the Congress on record that it recognizes the critical role that the private sector can play in the link between hunger and development, and the role food plays in giving a nation the freedom and security it needs to be stable and an important contributing member of the international community.

Mr. Speaker, I submit at this point in the RECORD the full text of our resolution for review by our colleagues:

H. CON. RES. —

Whereas the United States faces the challenge of leading the world to a new era of prosperity, created in significant part by enabling the dynamism of the private sector to use its creative talents in the third world;

Whereas nations have identified food self-reliance as a priority national goal;

Whereas the challenge to help the world's hungry is a global concern, ultimately a matter of United States national security, the direct result of a world grown more interdependent, and dictated by traditional humanitarian concerns;

Whereas the challenge must not be confronted solely within the context of an existing crisis, but with an eye toward the future food requirements of developing countries;

Whereas both the private and public sectors, by reason of their knowledge, experience, and other resources, have a valuable role to play in alleviating world hunger;

Whereas American involvement with helping the hungry abroad has encompassed a wide spectrum of activities in both the public and private sectors;

Whereas out of past successes and failures have come a better understanding of the benefits and limitations of the activities of each sector;

Whereas the issue is not generally public sector activities versus private sector activities, but the appropriate combination of each under the right conditions;

Whereas the conditions that are "right" vary enormously from country to country, depending on the respective stage of development of and the development priorities established by the country, and the services offered by prospective foreign investors;
